EVELYN ROCKWELL set the table for four, as had been her habit for years and then—remembering—dreadfully removed the unneeded silver from the north and south sides of the table, and two of the plates from the pile at her husband's place.

The children, now in the care of her sister, were on their way to distant schools, Elinor to college and Howard to a military academy. All the summer had gone in preparations for their departure. There was no day that had not seen activity toward that end, and it had all been joyous; the children on edge for the realization of their going-away dreams, their mother happy in their happiness. Through year after year of motherly care and solicitude, Evelyn had promised herself a rest time that was to be the happiest time in her life—when the children should be safely settled in good schools and she could give to her husband and receive from him the undivided devotion known in the early days of their marriage.

For Howard, Sr., had borne his full share in raising the family. He had worked and worried to "start the youngsters right" until there was a thin spot on the top of his head, and worry lines over his nose. Now he was deeply and comfortably absorbed in business, but from habit and not from any grinding necessity as had long been the case.

"Awful quiet with the kids gone, Evvy!" he observed at their silent meal.

Spartan-like, she held back her tears. "The worst of it is—is—vacation camps—we won't see them much—ever!"

"Well, well," he cheered her, "now's when you must have your innings. You've got a dandy ear and you can tear around without worrying about the family any more. Like to see you do it, too. You can get what clothes you want—why, you ought to be a happy woman!"

"I am a happy woman," asserted his wife in a shaky voice, and Howard Rockwell kissed her and, as usual, departed for the evening.

IN THE morning there were callers—privileged ones, of course, to choose that hour—Howard Rockwell's sister, Myrtle, and a lively spinster friend.

"We knew you'd be mourning like a regular Rachel, this morning," announced childless Myrtle, "so we've come to plan things, now you're free."

Miss Bunny, the spinster, lazily fat, added a word

Electrified India

The Seventh Article in a Series on "New Worlds"

By WILLARD PRICE

THINGS are not as they were in the days when was written

"The epitaph dears,
A fool lies here
Who tried to hustle the East."

The East is now quite accustomed to being hustled. When India even begins to pray by electricity, it must be granted that times have changed!

Motor-driven prayers are today a feature of Simla, the summer capital. This came to pass when engineers wanted to harness the mountain streams up to dynamos to supply light and power for Simla. The Buddhist priests objected. It seems that for centuries they had repeated their endless prayers until they grew weary, and one ingenious worshiper invented wheels on which were tacked pieces of paper with prayers written on them. If these wheels were kept continually in motion the prayers were just as effective, argued the lazy priests, as if they were verbally repeated.

The power for these prayer mills was obtained from the mountain streams. And now unbelieving foreigners proposed to divert that water power for commercial purposes. The priests incited the people against the engineers and for a time it looked as if the project to provide Simla with electricity must be given up.

Then the tactful but firm British Government took action. The power companies were given authority to proceed. They must agree, however, to supply all the prayer wheels with electric motors. Simla now prays by electric power.

The American business pioneer meets peculiar difficulties in India. He runs up against a superstition or a tradition at every turn.

A grease manufacturer sent a commercial traveler around the world to India at great expense. And when the man got there he found he could do nothing. India would not buy grease. Why? Because the Hindu religion regards the cow as a sacred animal. It is considered sacrilege to kill a cow, and good Hindus under no circumstances will touch the meat, tallow, hides, or similar articles in trade. The objection of some native regiments to using cartridges which had been greased with tallow is said to have precipitated the great mutiny of 1857.

A canny manufacturer of food products had a special label pasted on all packages for India: "This food contains no cow."

Since the members of some castes are not permitted even to touch an object which has been touched by a foreigner or one of lower caste, the product made entirely by machine has a great advantage. The high-caste Hindu will pick out every time the product labeled: "Untouched by human hands."

He will, if he can read the label. If it is a high-grade, expensive product, the buyer of such a product is probably educated, at least enough to be able to read. But if it is a cheap article designed for the common people, what then? The Yankee trader has a new difficulty to reckon with when he remembers that eighty-nine per cent. of the men of India and ninety-nine per cent. of the women can neither read nor write. How can he advertise his article among people unable to read?

PICTURES are the answer. It will be remembered that in old England before education was common a tavern or shop would hang out a sign on which would be painted no lettering whatever, but simply a picture, perhaps of a boar's head, or a crowing cock. Any one can read a picture, and the place promptly became known as the Boar's Head or the Crowing Cock.

The same ancient principle is employed in India today. The outside of a package will bear the life-size portrait of a cracker, with a tiger curled behind it. The Hindu will ask for the Tiger Cracker. Two different brands of American kerosene are known in India as the Elephant brand and the Monkey brand. Indian deities are frequently used as trade-marks.

Often it is the attractiveness of the picture which sells the goods rather than the quality of the article. Manufacturers vie with each other in getting out trade-marks which will be not only attractive and brilliantly colored, but of such subjects as will make a strong impression on the memory. Such trade-mark pictures, after being taken off the package, are seldom thrown away, but are usually pasted on the walls of native shops or houses, where they serve as a permanent decoration; also as an advertisement of the article to which they had been attached.

Public libraries are of limited use among people who can not read! Progressive libraries therefore make a specialty of their "visual instruction branch" in which they are glad to use advertising motion-picture films and any industrial or educational films of an informing character. Through the universal language of pictures, minds are reached which would remain blind before a printed page.

Those minds are helped to work more effectively by another Western invention—the electric fan. The intense heat of India puts brakes on the brain. Thus the electric fan is not merely a comfort but a real factor in the progress of the nation. For centuries the air of India has been stirred only by the punkah, a rectangular strip of cloth suspended from the ceiling and moved lazily to and fro by a punkahwallah pulling at the end of a rope. To be sure, a hall full of slowly waving and brilliantly colored punkahs was a sight to behold—but the palaces of the rajahs are today fitted with electric fans.

The picturesque glory of India's past is giving way to modern efficiency. That is one of the penalties the world must pay for progress. The quaint, splashing, creaking water-wheel has given way to the silent but efficient turbine. The sailing ship with its waving hills of canvas yields honors to the plain, steam-driven cargo-boat. The magnificent, plunging horses drawing the fire-engine are replaced by the motor. With every step of progress we have less fuss and fury, less picturesque display, and more efficiency. What a monotonous world this will be when it is entirely efficient—when everything works in smooth silence without an interesting gyrations or racket.

The gorgeously caparisoned elephant with a miniature house full of gaily dressed people on his mountainous back is also disappearing. His place is being taken by the automobile. The native nobility and princes of India are large purchasers of motor cars, sometimes owning dozens of them. Many of them are fond of sporting models, able to do eighty miles an hour.

How jealously the Hindu clings to fast fading glories is shown in the extreme ornateness of some of these cars. For example, the favorite car of a certain native ruler is painted a rich canary yellow with gold mountings, the upholstery being in old-gold silk brocade, with silk laces to match; also silk curtains in old-gold are fitted on either side of the Nizam's seat, which is a luxurious arm-chair raised slightly higher than the other seats in the car as befits the dignity of His Highness. The roof is domed with silver and the Nizam's coat of arms is painted on the panels.

Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal has an equally gorgeous equipage with one added feature—a rich curtain of violet silk which may be drawn to secure privacy. For it is most important that cars to be used by Mohammedan or high-caste Hindu ladies should be readily closed in by curtains to protect the fair occupants from the eyes of men and the touch of outcasts.

With automobiles whirling over the ancient, elephant-trodden highways, with American vacuum street-cleaners sucking up the dust of Bombay, with the proposal to introduce "road mirrors," five by ten feet in size, so that motorists may be able to see around busy corners, with white-ant-proof iron poles from Pittsburgh carrying electric cables freighted with power and light, it is very apparent that, in India, East and West have not only met—they have amalgamated.

INDIA now spends $1.91 a year per capita for foreign goods. The share of this which comes to the United States is four cents a year per capita. This amounts to a respectable sum when one considers that there are 315,000,000 people in India, but the sum might be much larger if we were as willing to take the trouble to sell as India is to buy.

This once Nirvana-dreaming land is now even sufficiently modernized to have a "Moloch" of industry. Thousands are consumed annually by the grind of factory and foundry. The change from simple home industries to complex factory industries has been so abrupt that laws for the protection of workers have not kept pace. In the last ten years the factories have increased by eighty per cent.

Children of both sexes work ten hours a day for a daily wage of five cents in the cotton mills of Bangalore. Many factories are paying a wage of from three to eleven cents for a day of fifteen hours or more. The evils of country life are supplanted by the much greater evils of crowded tenement life. Labor unrest is acute. To add to the difficulty of the situation, Bolshevik influences are active. In recent months there have been eighty-six strikes involving 300,000 people.

Titanic enterprises are going forward at great human cost. India now weaves enough cloth in a year from home-grown cotton and homespun yarn to belt the world forty times around. The Kolar gold mines yield annually ten million dollars worth of gold.

India, aboriginal home of the sugar-cane, manufactures more than a third of the world's sugar, which is, however, curiously muddy in character because religious prejudices forbid the use of animal charcoal for refining. Most of the world's bags and sacks are made from the jute of India.

In India's Pittsburgh the largest steel mills in Asia are manufacturing all the rails and coaches for India's railways—and India stands fourth country in the world in railroad mileage. And the largest hydro-electric project in the world is now being carried out in the Bombay Presidency at an estimated cost of eight million dollars, converting a head of water ten times as great as that of Niagara into electric power for the constantly increasing thousands of factories in and around Bombay.

While great in commerce and industry, India is greatest as an agricultural nation. But this greatness is potential. India has scarcely scratched the surface of her land. She raises only six bushels of wheat on an acre of land that under proper farming easily produces thirty-five. Yet, in spite of her crude methods, she exports more wheat to Great Britain than any other country. She is the greatest rice producer in the world. She is the greatest cotton producer in the world next to the United States.

India is a land of farmers. Seventy-two per cent. of the people, as against seven per cent. in England, live directly off the land. The best land in Europe can support not more than 250 persons to the square mile. The land in India, poorly cultivated as it is, must support often as many as 800 people to the square mile. The result is that the "support" is very slender and frail, breaking altogether in time of famine.

It is estimated that forty million of the sixty million "untouchables" of India go to bed hungry every night of the year. Their pathetic salutation to each other is, "Have you eaten?"

It is very evident that a crying need in India is for agricultural education. The government has not made adequate provision. It maintains 161 art colleges but only one agricultural college.

The desperate necessity of the people is reflected in the tradition of the sutra or farmer caste who believe that a world savior will soon appear. They say he is now doing penance in the Himalayas. When he is through he will come and reign for a thousand years. In those days there will be plenty for all, and tigers and lambs will eat together out of the same rice bowl.

But it is a question whether the world Saviour has not already arrived and is at work through such men as Sam Higginbottom, the farmer-missionary, and Arthur Slater, the "Reverend Sir Hen Merchant," and many others. For the missionaries realize that poverty-stricken India can never live a full Christian life until she learns how to get enough out of the soil to keep body and soul together.

Ignorant, half-starved, disease-ridden creatures are not apt to have lofty thoughts or perform noble deeds. Even if they do become nominal Christians they are not able to support a church and pay for their own Christian education. And America, generous as she

Congress on Disarmament

THERE is an indication that the shadow of jingoism is hovering over Congress, at least if we may judge from some of the recent speeches that have been made in the House of Representatives. However, there is in most of the discussion a saving vein of common sense, which modifies the flights of the orators and brings them down to something approaching a sensible working basis.

Mr. Connolly of Texas, speaking in the House on the naval building program, pointed out that our action in Congress would be an eloquent argument to the other nations. It would practically say to them:

If you are willing to disarm, if you mean what you say, if you are willing to devote some of your resources to the development of the industries of peace, instead of preparing for war, this great nation that has emerged from the greatest struggle that ever shook the foundations of the earth practically unimpaired, practically the only great nation that could look into the future, and, shaking the tears from her eyes, know that her future is secure—if you will agree with us to disarm, we will meet you half way; but unless you do, we shall continue to build the greatest nation that lies upon the Seven Seas!

This is not very dignified language for a world crisis. It sounds more like warning than encouragement. Suppose it should have been stated, instead, that we are willing, as a nation, to reduce our armaments, provided the other naval powers are like-minded and will unite with us in a pledge toward that end. Surely, when the whole world is waiting and praying for peace and looking to the three great powers to take the initiative, it is not a time to wave defiance at them. We have lately emerged from a war which, according to the estimate of Professor Strong of Harvard, has cost all the nations in direct expenditures for military and naval operations $186,000,000,000, with an indirect cost of $84,000,000,000, and a potential loss of life both direct and indirect of 43,000,000 human beings—the latter so terrible and far-reaching in its sacrificial aspect that, in the case of France alone, 70 years will be needed to recover from the loss in population. We should like to hear from some of the eloquent voices in Congress a statesman-like presentation of the broad humanitarian view, which is what the world needs and looks for from us today.

The old proverb: "In time of peace prepare for war" was a wise and useful one in its generation; but the larger vision, which should be in mind at the present time, would make it read: "Seize the great opportunity to build on solid foundations for world peace." We wait expectantly for some strong voice in Congress to be lifted up, which is capable of doing real justice to America's statesmanship. To let speeches of the jingo class go in that capacity is doing ourselves a severe international injustice, and belittling our influence and motives in the eyes of the world.

Christian Unity's Progress

SOUND and clamor are not always indicative of progress. There are many good people to whom it must appear that the lack of resounding demonstration in connection with the progress of the Christian Unity movement would seem to indicate a declining interest. It happens, however, that the very reverse is the fact. Christian Unity continues to make steady progress by calm and quiet methods, both at home and abroad. During February, several important conferences have been held at which plans for urging the Unity campaign were discussed. At the St. Louis conference, held early in the month Bishop Johnson of that city told of his experience as a member of the Lambeth Conference in England, and Bishop Nicolai of the Greek Orthodox Church gave impressions of the Conferences held in Switzerland. Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, outlined the present-day movement toward Unity, and several other speakers, representing different religious organizations, gave their views of the general progress during the year. The whole movement at the present time looks more and more definitely toward organic co-operation than it did in the earlier conferences.

That setbacks will occur is to be expected. In Great Britain the plan for Methodist union is making progress toward realization, even in the face of opposition within the Wesleyan Church which, as the parental body, holds fast to advisory privileges, and claims that the churches are not yet ripe for union. The Methodist Times of London, a sincere advocate of Unity, touches the quick of the opposition in declaring that the Wesleyans secretly favor union with the Church of England, which most British Methodists are assumed to oppose. Similarly in Australia, where three important groups—Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian—have been steadily moving toward Unity, there is a sudden halt in the progress. While 80 per cent. of the Congregationalists and 75 per cent. of the Methodists are recorded as favorable to union, only 60 per cent. of the Presbyterians give it their support. This lukewarmness on the part of the last-named denomination is now openly said to have been due to the opposition of a few leaders whose attitude is attributed to "pride of history, pride of place and pride of scholarship." But we have the faith to believe that all such stumbling blocks will ultimately disappear, and that the true spirit of Christian solidarity, which we hold to be steadily increasing in the Church as well as outside of it, will yet show the way to the various bodies to put aside all other considerations in order that the Church may become a great, united body "one in faith, one in love, one in charity."

The first great step to be accomplished is the breaking down of the old fences, but this does not necessarily imply denominational extinction. It will be long before the memories and associations of those historic bodies that have been the standard-bearers in all Gospel advance at home and abroad will be put aside. But even that day will come.

We need a united Church, with every battalion in its place and all co-operating in Christian service under the great Commander. We have already seen how imperative Christian Unity has become in the foreign mission fields. Some day soon it will be made clear to all that it is equally urgent at home. Christianity's forces must go on, each in its place and all together. It is the only way to victory!

The Bible and the Inauguration

IN HIS notable book on the "Religious Foundations of America," Rev. Dr. Charles L. Thompson gives some interesting and appropriate passages relative to the place of the Bible in the inaugural ceremonies. He tells of the precedent set when Washington was inaugurated, and also at subsequent inaugurations, in this memorable passage:

It is remarkable that the place of the Bible in the life of the Nation was fixed by precedent and public sentiment, and not by law. It was a day when infidelity was popular. But when Washington was ready to assume the office of President of the new republic, he asked for a Bible. Stepping out on the balcony of Federal Hall, Wall Street, New York, in full sight of the assembled multitude, he laid his right hand on the open Book while repeating the constitutional oath, and then reverently kissed the page. State Chancellor Livingston turned down the corner of the page toward the words of Genesis 49:24—"His bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob."

This custom has never been violated by a President-elect. The Bible is usually opened at random by the clerk of the Supreme Court; a record is made of the passage kissed, and the Book presented to the President's wife. Cleveland used a little red Bible given to him as a boy by his mother. Roosevelt placed his lips to the words of James 1:22: "But be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only." The Bible was opened for President Wilson almost at the middle. He kissed the page at Psalm 119:46: "I will speak of thy testimonies before Kings and will not be ashamed."

These and other instances in unbroken succession ever since the first inaugural, prove that by tradition, by precedent, by common law and established custom the Word of God was in evidence as a national recognition of the Divine sovereignty. It is eminently fitting that this should be so. Our nation was founded on the principles of Christianity and the U. S. Supreme Court on various occasions, and also the Supreme Court of several of the states, have ruled that the nation is Christian and that Christianity is a part of the common law of the land. These facts give to the inaugural ceremony the character of a solemn religious national function. We trust that the use of the Bible at the incoming of a new administration may always be a feature of the inaugural ceremony.

Passing It On

THE letter we print below belongs to a class of correspondence which is very gratifying to the editors of the Christian Herald. M. D. and N. C. E., of Elmira, Oreg., are the joint writers of the communication:

The Christian Herald comes to our home; we read it through and pass it on. Its words of comfort to our souls bring weekly feasts worth more than gold. Happy thoughts to us indeed which others have a chance to read. We have a daughter teaching school in ——— County. We enjoy the Christian Herald wonderfully. On the day we receive our copy, we mail the previous copy to daughter and we have kept this plan going over a year. She writes us that the Christian Herald, which she has been able to read in her parental home from the time she first learned her letters, goes a-touring among many of her school patrons, and then returns for her to read many of its gems aloud to the Young People's Class. May God abundantly bless and strengthen the Christian Herald staff in the prayer of two of your aged readers.

These good people, and thousands of other subscribers who believe in "passing on" their Herald after it has done service in their own family circle, are really doing the best kind of home missionary work. We know that the aggregate number of subscribers who widen the influence of the paper in this way must be very large. By this means it reaches a multitude of homes all over the land, where it has become a welcome guest, and where in many cases it is ultimately taken on regular subscription.

There are other ways of doing missionary work in the same connection. A considerable number of our readers send extra subscriptions for the paper in the names of friends at home or abroad, whom they wish to share the benefit of its regular visits. But the proportion of subscribers who, after the folks at home have read the paper, do as our Oregon friends have been doing—send it on its travels to others, who in turn pass it on until it has done its full duty and multiplied its readers many times—must be very large. We have no means of accurately estimating the extent of this secondary circulation, but we know that it is a very considerable factor in the influence of the publication.

Good Signs

DURING a recent two-day evangelistic tour of eastern towns, the editor noted the following cheerful signs of returning religious life in America:

Religious denominations met with a spirit of unanimity never before noted, even among the groups that came together. The pulpits of Episcopal churches were open to the speaker, with a heartiness and cordiality that were extremely gratifying. And the meetings for conferences revealed a oneness of purpose and an absence of jealousy and division that were in sharp contrast with many such gatherings a few years ago.

The theme that seemed to create the greatest interest was the old theme of the Gospel. Not a discussion of economic or industrial problems, but a statement of the Jesus way. Many papers, in giving accounts of the meetings, laid emphasis even in editorial comment on the answer to the industrial troubles as not to be found in the matter of wages or hours of labor, but in the observance of the Golden Rule by both capital and labor, as the only real answer to the whole vexed question of industry.

The next theme close to the Gospel message that excited general interest was the question of actual disarmament. Even in the center of the steel industry, when the statement was made that the whole world would be better off if not a single battleship were any longer constructed, the audiences cheered. And the encouraging thing to the speaker was that the heads of steel constructing companies said their business could be readily adjusted to disarmament, even a disarmament which meant the complete cessation of making armorplate, on account of the increasing demand for commercial steel for building purposes.

But the main thing that was a good sign to the speaker, the ministers, and the audiences generally, was the fact that the most radical utterance asking the United States to step out and set the example to the world of disarmament, met at once with deep approval. There is little doubt that if the people of the United States could vote on the question, divorced from all political pressure, they would vote overwhelmingly for real and complete disarmament and the end of war.

Another good sign of the meetings during the two-day plan was the healthy attitude taken toward bodily weakness, disease and death. No effort was made to create an atmosphere of miraculous healing or cures. But the response to the New Testament rules of health and happiness was immediate and helpful. The people who came to be helped went away helped, not by the speaker so much as by the assurance of God's promises and the Master's power as the Great Physician. The open door of hope for the sick and despairing may yet prove to be one of the greatest means of reviving faith in a Gospel which was intended to reach all the parts of a human being's life.

Altogether, the results of the meetings were of the cheering kind. Good signs they were of a healthy return to the Gospel of Jesus, after the apathy and indifference of the dark days of the war.

The World News of the Week

Senate Passes Emergency Tariff Bill Much Amended

THE Emergency Tariff bill, designed to aid the farmers, has been passed by the Senate by a vote of 43 to 30 and sent to conference with the House, but there was slight chance that it would become law in the few days remaining of the Wilson administration. A veto by President Wilson was considered certain and enough Senators were opposed to the measure to prevent its passage over the veto, although Congress recently has manifested a tendency to override the President's wishes.

The passage of the bill was due to Democratic support, nine Democrats from the West and Southwest supporting it, while four Eastern Republicans voted against it. Solid Democratic opposition would have insured its defeat. The Senate made many changes in the measure during the month and a half it was before that body, much of the time preventing the consideration of important fiscal bills, and among its additions were duties of 12 cents a dozen on eggs, 8 cents a pound on butter, and an extra 1 cent a pound on sugar. As it went to conference, the bill carried duties of 40 cents a bushel on wheat, 15 cents a bushel on corn, 25 cents a bushel on potatoes, 30 per cent. ad valorem on cattle, and 25 per cent. ad valorem on many other kinds of meats.

Senator Moses, of New Hampshire, one of the four Republican opponents of the bill, offered as a substitute for it the Payne-Aldrich tariff act of 1910, declaring that if the country was to have tariff legislation he favored a real protective measure. Only one other senator supported his motion.

Republican leaders in the House opposed the amended bill and prepared to fight the adoption of a conference report. Representative Fordney, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, went to Florida to consult Mr. Harding regarding tariff legislation.

Europe's Debts to America

REPAYMENT of Europe's debts to the United States has been causing much discussion both in this country and abroad, particularly since a section of the French press has been asserting that President Wilson had promised at Paris to use his influence to have Congress cancel the Allied debts, and that Colonel House had said many times that the United States never would call for the payment of the French debt.

Such assertions were denied by Thomas W. Lamont, one of the President's advisers at the Peace Conference, in a talk with Mr. Harding at St. Augustine, Fla. He declared Mr. Wilson and his advisers at Paris, without exception, had opposed vigorously and finally any suggestion of debt cancellation. "There was no commitment, expressed or implied, near or remote, moral or otherwise, as to the handling of the Allies' indebtedness to the United States," he headed. "I was able to assure Mr. Harding, from my knowledge of what took place at the Peace Conference, that as to his future policy in this whole matter, he is as free and untrammelled as air."

That Great Britain is anticipating no remission of debts was shown by the announcement of Austen Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the British Government must make provision during the next year to pay the interest on the American debt. Up to November 15, 1920, Britain owed to the United States interest accrued and unpaid amounting to $314,582,824; while the unpaid balance on the loan was $4,196,818,538. France's debt was in the neighborhood of $3,000,000,000 and French economists were frankly worried over the finding of means to meet it, with Germany seeking to escape so far as possible her reparations debts.

Congress was interesting itself in the unexpended credits voted for foreign governments and the Senate Judiciary Committee exacted from Secretary Houston an assurance that he would permit no further advances until he had consulted the committee. As some of the purposes for which the credits were advanced do not now exist, he estimated that the actual credit balance would not exceed $75,000,000. The committee was beginning an examination of all the foreign loans, a grant of $5,000,000 to Czechoslovakia four days after the armistice being the first taken up.

Indemnity Outlook Gloomy

AS THE time for the Reparations Conference in London drew nearer, French officials were decidedly pessimistic regarding the chances for an agreement and were predicting that later conferences would be necessary—views which apparently were shared in Berlin official circles. On everything else Berlin and Paris were widely at variance, Premier Briand having received notification from the French Parliament that he may expect the overthrow of his ministry if he reduces the indemnity, and the German foreign minister having been instructed by his government to refuse to sign the proposals.

The French press was demanding a show of force to compel the Germans to accept the terms approved at the Paris conference of Allied premiers, and the seizure of additional German territory was suggested. If Germany refuses her consent to treaty modifications, the Allies might notify her that she must pay company. He reviewed recent efforts to bring about peace and defended the government's insistence that the Sinn Feiners surrender their arms as a preliminary to a truce—the demand which prevented an agreement—on the ground that the Sinn Fein leaders were being pressed hard and that a truce would have enabled them to restore broken communications and prepare for more dangerous attacks.

Despite the Premier's optimism, Ireland was far from quiet. On the Cork-Bandon line, when Sinn Feiners ambushed a train carrying military, there was a battle in which eight passengers and two of the attacking force were killed. In County Cork the Sinn Feiners were destroying bridges and damaging roads so as to make it easier to attack the British patrols traveling in motor trucks, and the guerilla warfare had been intensified to an unparalleled degree.

Presbyterian Commission Meets

THE American Section of the Executive Commission of the Reformed Churches of the World holding the Presbyterian system has been in session in Washington, Pa., with the making of arrangements for the meeting of the General Council of the organization in Pittsburg beginning September 16, as an important part of its work. There are 35,000,000 members of the Reformed Churches of the World, and many delegates from Europe will be present at the Pittsburg gathering.

Rev. James F. Good of Philadelphia presented a report as chairman of the Committee on Work on the European Continent and the delegates voted to petition the General Council to organize a united work to help war-stricken Europe. Another proposal was that the Council draw up an answer to the proposals for Christian Unity promulgated last summer by the Lambeth conference in London.

Rev. R. P. Mackay, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Canadian Presbyterian Church, offered a report attacking Japan's policies in Asia, and declaring the brutality of Japan's treatment of Korea to be "comparably only to Turkish massacres in Armenia." Even the Koreans who had migrated to Manchuria to escape Japanese tyranny, he said, were followed by a force of 15,000 Japanese, who methodically burned village after village and shot the inhabitants.

Huge Liquor Refunds Predicted

RECENT rulings by the Treasury Department will necessitate the return of from $1,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000 to distillers, liquor dealers and former saloon-keepers, according to estimates furnished to the Senate by Senators Smoot and Frelinghuysen. It was explained that the money is to be returned for "obsolescence of property" of those whose businesses were ended by the prohibition legislation. Senator Smoot said the Treasury ruling provides allowance for good-will, trade-marks and various assets of an intangible nature.

Dry leaders considered the estimates of the senators to be excessive and expressed the belief that the refunds would fall far short of the $1,000,000,000 mark. Claims have arisen from the fact that distillers withdrew whisky for medicinal purposes, but were taxed at the beverage rate of $6.40 a gallon, instead of the medicinal rate of $2.40 a gallon, because of the contention that much of the whisky was diverted to illegal uses. The Solicitor of the Internal Revenue Bureau has ruled that the distiller is not liable for the higher tax if liquor withdrawn in good faith for non-beverage purposes finds its way into illegal channels, but this question has not been settled finally, and the Attorney-General will be asked for an opinion.

THE WILSONS MOVING INTO THEIR NEW RESIDENCE

On March 4 Mr. and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson transfer their home from the White House to this beautiful dwelling at 2340 S Street, southwest, in Washington, purchased at a price said to be $150,000. They began their moving early, as the photograph shows, so as to have things in readiness by Inauguration Day.

the sum fixed or an even larger total within thirty instead of forty-two years and then take military action on that basis. The French believed that the Germans were counting on the new American administration to obtain a modification of the Allied demands but expressed confidence that America would countenance nothing injurious to France's interests.

The House of Commons rejected by a vote of 181 to 40 a motion of censure of the British policy relating to the employment of the Versailles Treaty. Premier Lloyd George reiterated his pledge that Germany would be made to pay "to the limit of her capacity."

Tells of Improvement in Ireland

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE, reviewing in the House of Commons the Irish situation, declared conditions throughout the island were improving decidedly and predicted that if the British people were patient "order will be restored to Ireland, and with order, liberty." He said that murders no longer were committed with impunity, that Sinn Fein patrols have gone, and Sinn Fein courts have disappeared, and that the Crown forces have recovered their authority.

Replying to former Premier Asquith's request for the application of the Strickland report on the burning of Cork, the suppression of which evoked much protest, the Premier announced it would be kept secret. He admitted, however, that some members of the British auxiliary forces were implicated and said very severe measures had been taken with regard to one

Power for Witnessing

TEXT—Acts 1:8. "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and you shall be my witnesses."

THEY, therefore, when they were come together, asked Him." It seems to be a pre-arranged inquiry. They had been talking the subject over. "Is the old material glory to return to Israel?" Is the radiant time of David and Solomon to come back with all its life, and prowess, and power? If so, there will be some fine offices vacant for somebody! The proud representatives of Rome will be swept over the seaboard, and some empty places will be waiting! How the apostles would once again canvass these vacant posts! They would not long talk about the revival of the old kingdom without tending to the more personal matter as to who would occupy the supreme places in the sovereignty. The old controversy would leap into their hearts once more, and again they would "contend with one another as to who should be the greatest."

The apostle Peter, who had once said to his Master: "What shall we have therefore?" was nursing the same inquiry still. James and John were still cherishing their mother's ambition, and were eagerly coveting places on the right hand and on the left in the Lord's kingdom. And in the midst of all their wranglings one can imagine that Matthew, the publican, would obtrude his claim, and on the plea of his own official knowledge of governmental life, would argue for the sovereign place.

Do I really think that this happened? After so startling and extraordinary an event as the resurrection of the Lord, would not all things be changed by this stupendous occurrence? No, I think not. It is marvelous how little a vast external event can alter the plane and trend of one's thoughts. Such a phenomenon may excite and even exalt the feelings, and yet not be influential in transforming the thoughts. After the event, the old mental habits re-assert themselves, and fundamentally we are not changed.

I knew a man who had lived for the making of money. His whole ambition was bent upon it. His desires were absorbed in it. Then his friend suddenly died. The man was profoundly moved, and the great deeps in his life appeared to be broken up. There was no one standing at that graveside who seemed to have been more deeply and severely checked. And yet on the way back from the cemetery, this grief-stricken man said to me: "I wonder how much he has left?" The external event had disturbed his feelings, but had left unchanged the tendency of his thought. And is it not frequently so in sickness? A bodily ailment subdues us, makes us temporarily soft and gentle, but frequently leaves us unchanged. And temporary affliction passes, and our minds rebound to their old exercises, and our thoughts move in the old track.

AND so I think it was with these apostles. They had been so long thinking about a material kingdom, and feasting in expectancy upon its offices, that even so great an event as the Resurrection did not break the habit, and their mental drift was unchanged. They were still eager, still jealous and still quarrelsome, and between the Resurrection and Pentecost they clamored for the supreme place. And perhaps—who knows?—perhaps it was long-headed Thomas who one day obtruded in the controversy with some question as this: "Are we not a little premature? Perhaps there will be no vacant places! Let us ask the Lord Himself!" "They, therefore, when they were come together, asked Him, saying, Lord, dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"

Now see the Master's answer. "Ye shall receive power!" How they would listen when the Master mentioned "power"! It was power they were coveting, power which was the theme of their controversy. "Ye shall receive power," but not belonging to a national office, but springing from a mystic relationship; not the power which comes from the occupancy of a place, but the power which belongs to the possession of the Spirit; "When the Holy Ghost is come upon you."

How revolutionary the answer! Was this to be the power of the Kingdom? At once all the national and imperial dignities and distinctions vanished from their minds. "The pomp of be accepted or rejected; witness for Me!" Now, a witness has to tell what he knows; his speech is rigidly confined to the facts of his experience. We at once stop a witness if he begins to tell what he thinks. We do not want his theories, his imaginings; we demand his knowledge. The Holy Spirit is creative of a certain kind of life. His fellowship with men produces a great experience. Than this experience nothing can be more certain. This experience we are to tell out, and witness among our fellowmen.

"Witnesses in Jerusalem." What? "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that stonest the prophets!" Are they to witness there? "It can not be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem?" Are they to witness there? Yes, they are called upon to witness to people who have scorned and rejected the King, and they will require "power" for that kind of witnessing. It is easy to tell the news to those who are greedy for it, but to go and labor among those who confront it with mockery and sneers, demands the very endurance and compassion of the Lord Himself. "Master, the Jews of late sought to stone Thee, and goest Thou thither again?" Yes, back to the scornors! We are to witness in Jerusalem."

"AND in Samaria." What? "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." Are they to witness to them? The disciples once found their Master witnessing to a Samaritan, "and they marveled that Ye spake with the woman." And they had to go there? They are to witness for Christ to people from whom they have been estranged.

That is our vocation, too. When the Holy Spirit comes unto us we have the power to approach those with whom we have hitherto had no dealings, and to confess to them the living Christ. We have got to commend Christ to those with whom we have refused to speak. How are we to do it? I do not know. The Holy Ghost is given to us to make every instance plain. We can not make detailed plans of campaign. Each estrangement must be approached according to its own needs. "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak." Estrangements melt down most mysteriously under ministries such as these.

There are few who will resist or resent an approach of any man or woman who is filled with the power of the Holy Spirit. We are to witness "in Samaria."

"And in the uttermost parts of the earth." What? I think of the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, the regions beyond Samaria. I think of the woman of those parts, and how the disciples dealt with her in the olden days. "Send her away!" "Send her away!" They thought of her much as our people have thought of the Calibans of the undeveloped races of the earth. And the Lord called them to witness there! It was a great revolution. But it was a revolution made possible by revolutionary power.

All these things are impossible to the natural man, but to the spiritual man they are the native exercises of the redeemed life.

ONLY three states—Massachusetts, New York and Wisconsin—have bona fide laws requiring every employer of labor in a manufacturing or mercantile establishment, with certain exceptions, to allow every person employed in such establishments at least twenty-four consecutive hours of rest in every seven consecutive days. Here is a field for the Church to make its influence felt in bettering conditions.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Holy Ghost, with Light Divine," or "He Leadeth Me."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—"The Promise of Israel's Restoration." Jeremiah, Chap. 32: Verses 37 to 44.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 185, first column.)

Sermon—"POWER FOR WITNESSING"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Near the Cross," or "The Shining Shore."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Thou who didst work at common toil in a small shop, using tools of labor, help us to glorify our daily work about the home, or the shop, or wherever we have to work. May we never shirk our task or turn out poor work on purpose or carelessly, as Thou didst not make poor furniture for the people of Nazareth. Keep us good workmen and workwomen this week, we pray Thee. We ask it in Thy Name, O Saviour of the world. AMEN.

power" no longer absorbed their gaze. These things passed away, and in their minds there arose quite other conditions. These men were Bible students, and they had read and pondered about men of old, on whom the Spirit had breathed and rested. The Spirit had been with Jeremiah, and he was a man of power; not the power of royal dignity, but the power which prefers a dungeon with honor to the kingly favor with shame. Upon Amos the Spirit had rested, and he, too, was a man of power; not the power which won the king's distinctions, but the power which antagonized the king's will. And this was the kind of power that the Master promised, power to quietly know the mind of God, power to purely live the life of God, power to nobly bear the will of God, power to strongly strive in the purpose of God. This was the power of the men of Anathoth, and this, too, was the power of the man of Tekoa. "Ye shall receive power," the supreme dignity of human kind, "when the Holy Ghost is come upon you."

"AND ye shall be my witnesses." Not deputy governors to rule the peoples, but witnesses to commend and justify the Lord. Their distinction had to consist in this, that they were to tell out what they knew about Him. "I stand at the bar of mankind to be judged by them, to

The Blessing of a Curse

SUNDAY. Gen. 3:17. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." "Cursed is the ground!" Yes, who has not realized the blessing which is hidden in the curse? God laid restrictions upon the land in order that, by the means of the restriction, man might be helped to recover his freedom. Man had fallen by disobedience. His relationship with God was perverted. He was afflicted with spiritual crookedness. How to recover his straightness, his rectitude—that was the problem. It would only be done by the wonderful ministry of the boundless grace of God.

And yet that grace not only works upon the soul in direct and immediate constraints; it also works indirectly in a thousand different appointments. For one thing it curses the ground, so that the ground holds its harvests in bonds until they are released by human toil. And so labor becomes imperative, and man has to work for his living, and his labor is the medium of divine grace. The ground is cursed so that the man may be blessed. His very toil is purposed to be the helpmeet of his salvation. When he works for a living, his work is to aid him in the recovery of a life.

And who has not tasted this blessing which was thus enshrined in a curse? Honest labor is the antagonist of many a vile foe, and it drains away many a bad humor from the soul. "What a blessing it was I had some work to do!" That is the thankful utterance of millions of people, and they are finding their blessing in an original curse. The ground was cursed for their sake.

And how is it with the sorrows which sometimes leap upon us like lions from the thicket? We are dazed by the attack. Our united life was so sweet and simple, it was fragrant and lovely as a garden. And then death swooped down upon us, and the garden became an open grave. Nay, the entire world seemed to be smitten with the gloom of the tomb, and all our ways were darkened. But grace broke through the gloom! The Lord was in the stricken garden. Angel presences whispered of resurrection. Yes, and there was another helper when everything seemed to be shaking. We had our work. "I don't know what I should have done if I had had nothing to do!" No, poor soul, but thy labor was a means of grace, and it steadied thy powers in days and nights of angel presence, and it was purposed to brace and hearten the pilgrim of the night.

And so it is, we find our blessing in the primary curse. Our harvest rises in the wilderness. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake."

And all this is a revelation of the wonderful love of God. The clouds we so much dread are big with blessing. "Out of the eater comes forth meat, and out of the strong comes forth sweetness." God laid upon us this burden of toil, lest we should be corrupted by indolence into deeper degradation. For it is true indeed that Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do. Idleness befriends disobedience. It relaxes all our powers by swathing the soul in a soft and softening atmosphere of enervation. That is why men who retire too early from business speedily go to pieces. They have lost something vital. They have dismissed one of life's strong angels, and the tonic has gone from their roads.

Let us thank God for the blessing of labor. Let us praise Him for all restrictions which demand our toil. Let us be grateful for the ground that was cursed. In working to release the energies of the earth we help our own emancipation. J. H. J.

The Greatness of Lincoln

MONDAY. Psa. 18:35. "Thy gentleness hath made me great." David in his sin and sorrow had drawn from God's merciful gentleness the power which gave him the greatness of goodness, as well as the ability in his wonderful Psalms to touch all the chords of joy and sorrow in the human heart.

The gentleness that makes the true gentleman was the crowning glory of Abraham Lincoln's character. He bore the burdens of a nation with the patience of sublime gentleness. He pardoned the unfortunate soldier with the gentleness of heavenly forgiveness. Such a spirit is greater than that which taketh a city.

When the writer of this article was a Christian Commission delegate, it was his great privilege to accompany President Lincoln as he visited the hospitals in City Point, while on his way to Richmond. The President walked through every tent of six thousand wounded, shaking hands with the soldiers, and often making the cheering remark to the boys in gray: "The war is over now, boys; you will soon be home again." He filled the Divine requirement: "To be good, to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God." E. W. C.

The Union of the Divine and Human

TUESDAY. I. Tim. 3:16. "God manifest in the flesh." The Incarnation is called "the mystery of godliness." As the cherubim bent in reverent perplexity over the Ark of the Covenant so do we devoutly ponder this fundamental truth. "The angels desire to look into it!" But shall it be rejected because we cannot understand it?

Where would that lead us? There are mysteries on every hand which we receive without a murmur because we cannot help doing so. Explain the influence of mind over matter if you can. Tell me how I lift my hand, at the behest of my will, and I will agree to make everything clear as to the interweaving of the divine and human in the person of the God-man.

In this mystery of the Incarnation there is nothing that antagonizes a single law of human thought. Certainly it is beyond us; but so are all the great spiritual verities. We walk by faith; and faith is "the evidence of things not seen." D. J. B.

The Virtue of Contentment

WEDNESDAY. Heb. 13:5. "And be content with such things as ye have." Blessed are they who find great meanings and great values in common things. It has been said that Christ's three favorite words were "the least," "the last" and "the lost." "The least" were the children. "The last" were the humble. "The lost" were the outcast and despised. The Master's attitude to children was beautiful. But was not that His attitude towards all weak things?

Small things are the index of great. The Master regarded nothing as too small to be significant. He reminded us that the sparrow is not unnoticed in heaven. There is a whole philosophy in that. It is easy to say, "Be content with a few things." But in our day, our desires increase with new inventions and devices. The gift of Christ, however, is a simplicity that delivers its possessor from bondage to the desire for everything that glitters.

To be content with a few things, but to choose the right things—is this not the very essence of wisdom, worldly and unworldly, human and divine? C. C. A.

Chastisement and Sonship

THURSDAY. Heb. 12:6. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." There is perhaps no one phase or feature of our early lives which stands out so prominently, and which has all through life caused us so many mingled feelings, as the corrections of our early childhood. How hard it was for us in those early days to feel even the justice of it all, much less the mercy and love. But afterward, as we looked back our feeling for the ones who chastened us was at least reverence, and sometimes thankfulness.

And how wonderfully true is this fact of experience to the relationship that exists between us and our Father in Heaven. He may see that it is necessary to send upon us one thing after another, until, like the old Patriarch of Uz, we cry out "He breaketh me with breach upon breach!"

But man is not a machine, neither is he machine-made; and the Creative Intelligence at work in your life and mine is the God of Love. Now, it is not that God loves us because we have been chastened, for that would savor too much of pity; but He chastens us because He loves us. He knows the possibilities within us, and His loving heart cannot be satisfied with anything short of the very best for each one. Chastisements are God's tools for working out His own image in your life and mine. I. D. L.

The Right Way to Go to Church

FRIDAY. Rev. 1:10. "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's Day." It would be a great help to us if we could remember that the only way to keep the Lord's Day is to keep it in the Lord's way. To enjoy anything we must be in the right spirit.

It should be the spirit of preparation. So many people get up so late on Sunday morning that they have no time to prepare for Sunday worship. They are compelled to dress hastily, eat breakfast quickly, and then run to church. There has been no preparation of the spirit for a spiritual service, no time for a word of prayer, a little communion with God, a few minutes of quiet meditation.

There should also be the spirit of prayer. We are too often likely to be irreverent in the presence of God. How few heads are bowed, how few hearts offer up prayer, asking blessing upon the service. We should remember that the primary object of going to church is not to hear the sermon, but to worship God; it is not simply to come into social contact with other people, but into spiritual contact with our Heavenly Father.

We should also come into the house of God in the spirit of praise. The old songs of the church should find hearty expression in the way we sing them. There should be a joyousness of spirit, a heartiness of worship, a cheerfulness of countenance that would make the church the very gate of Heaven to our souls. W. W. B.

The Victorious Life

SATURDAY. Rev. 2:7. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life." The greatest battlefields of history are invisible. The arena wherein were gained the most glorious victories is unseen. The history of the triumphs of faith is unwritten to a very large extent. There are two records for every moral conflict—the record on the score card of public approval, and the record on the character of the winner. Sometimes public opinion renders the verdict of defeat, when in reality God, Who reads the heart, sanctions an act with His "well done."

Sometimes success demands too big a price. No one can afford to win at the expense of individual honor. Character is greater than cash. The things of God outweigh the things of gold. Moral waste is the greatest waste in the world. The only kind of a man that God can use and that the world needs is a good man. Morality is the cornerstone of efficiency, and a good conscience the best business asset. R. B.

Thoughts for Lenten Season

By REV. EDWIN W. CASWELL

LUKE 23:34. "Father, forgive them!" What a godlike act! Behold the Son of God, beaten with rods, crowned with thorns, mangled with nails, hanging on His wounds. Listen to His prayer, "Father, forgive them!" He is not thinking of Himself; His blood is flowing for the pardon of His persecutors; The Cross is the hope of glory for the sinful and Christ is the infinite Forgiver, suffering for the sins of a race. He prays for all sinners during all the ages of time; His forgiveness is forever. He is a picture of loving kindness. It will take an eternity to understand the wondrous mystery of Calvary.

If our sins are sunk like a millstone in the bottom of the sea, if the ocean of His love flows over them forever, should we not forgive as we are forgiven and pray for those who despitefully use us?

Forgiveness, it is said, is the odor which flowers yield when trampled upon, and the poet writes,

"The sandal tree perfumes when riven
The axe that laid it low;
Let man, who hopes to be forgiven,
Forgive and bless his foe."

God will not forgive us till we are willing to receive His nature and become His faithful followers. To forgive without conversion would be to sanction the evil in man, condoning his offence.

"Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy." Not because we have been kind, but because we manifest the true spirit which alone commends us to God. If we would enjoy the truth, we must be true; if we would have love, we must remember that love begets love; by showing yourself friendly, you will have friends, even among your enemies. Stephen exclaimed, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." Martyrs have shown no resentment towards their persecutors. President McKinley, when shot by the man he was shaking hands with, exclaimed, "Do no harm to the young man," and thus he acted like his Master, who prayed for His murderers.

Nations, like individuals, must follow Christ's forgiving spirit, as this is the only real Christianity. In a Young Woman's Christian Association meeting in France, it is said that "Holy Night" was sung and all present joined in the song in their own language, French, Swiss, Austrian, Belgian, Pole, Italian and Russian. We know that music is the same in all tongues. It is the Heavenly Father's picture of unity among all the peoples in His great family. All are forgiven alike when repentant; the melody of forgiveness is God's richest music.

We know that mortals cannot forgive sin; we can only remove our own resentment; God is the Forgiver of sin; His pardon makes a new being out of the rebellious. He justifies and sanctifies. A judge must do differently from a friend; he is sworn to execute the law. "Vengeance is mine," saith the Lord. He is our Judge until we receive Christ as our Saviour; therefore we are guilty before Him until we receive His forgiveness.

MISS ELLA V. BAINES, Box 228 SPRINGFIELD, OHIO

can be sure they'll be looked after. Not that I'm blaming mamma," she defended loyally "nor dad either; he went off to get work. Jamie looks just like him," she added wistfully.

"Do they know?" faltered Evelyn, her heart aching with maternal impulses—to make the children clean and sweet, to dress them, to have the boy's teeth attended to and to get straggly Florence in a barber's chair.

"I'm just going to leave 'em," replied Cora with the resignation of the poor. "I won't say goodbye—Florence would go all to pieces like she does."

Evelyn knew that the going to pieces would come with the inevitable discovery of their desertion—probably in the night.

"It sha'n't happen to her!" she told herself with a fury of purpose. "They sha'n't be left like that. I'll tell them myself." She was trembling and felt Cora's curious eyes upon her. Her hand sought her long wristbag and encountered the bulky fold of traveler's checks prepared for an extended stay at The Springs.

Defiantly she gripped them—they were hers. Why shouldn't she spend them for what she wanted? Didn't she know what she wanted better than that laughing doctor? She leaned toward Cora and smiled winningly.

"Cora," she entreated tensely, "give them to me."

EVELYN'S appearance and manner had already made a favorable impression on Cora Sutter, and the lure of a wealthy foster-mother in place of a "home" was strong, but the poor are wise beyond their years; suspicion is bred in them and they demand proofs of integrity. In this sudden crisis, Cora followed strictly the path of caution, fearful though she was of offending the wonderful woman who wanted to mother Jamie and Florence.

Evelyn, however, could take no offense at Cora's request for "references." There was, she said, a clergyman somewhere in Kansas City, who had once lived in her home town of the Rockwells and who would vouch for her.

From a hotel bedroom, Evelyn telephoned patiently and at last she found her man, and the quartette made their way to the address given in his kindly voice.

With the ring of his last sentence in her ears, Cora left the conference and was silent on the way back to the hotel.

"—a most unusual opportunity—a wonderful chance for them! I can't get over the surprise of it."

Neither, seemingly, could Cora. "Kiddies," she told them, huskily, "you're going to have Mrs. Rockwell for your mother—you don't care if I go back to work and leave you with her, do you? You won't cry, will you?"

Both shook their heads, but Florence showed signs of tears. The breakdown seemed imminent when her sister kissed her sticky little lips and Evelyn herself fought hard for composure in the trying moment of separation. But she knew many mother-ways for diverting a hysterical child. The crisis passed and Cora Sutter was gone.

"Why did that man keep following us, Mrs. Rockwell?" asked Jamie that night, through a lather of warm soap-suds that accompanied his very first "bath in a tub."

"I didn't see any man," said Evelyn, flushed and contented with her strenuous occupation. "Call me mother, Jamie-boy."

THE hotel was speedily changed for a family boarding-house, and here were spent the first of those "happiest days" to which she had looked forward so long. And the queer part of it was that their happiness consisted in their very duplication of what she had considered the most trying of times—the close care of dependent little children.

Once more her mother-pats and murmured endearments soothed the night-cries of a fear-ridden baby; again, she banished teary thoughts from tired little heads with foolish tales carried over with the years, and just as of old, she thrilled with the mother-joy of soft hands clutching her for protective comfort in the dark night, and of hearing a voice calling "Are you there, mother?"

Her husband should know everything when she had the children ready. He wrote in the rather stilted terms of affection which he had employed in the few letters of their engagement period. Evelyn was amply content. Her replies were detailed descriptions of the parks, the beneficial effects of the mineral waters on her acquaintances and the incidental mention of her own improvement.

She had not set definitely in her mind a time for her return with her new family, though she felt that the children should enjoy a real Thanksgiving at home, and then begin school. Jamie's teeth had been filled and he had howled mightily, but she had held him in the chair with her old-time firmness.

There was a sewing-machine at her disposal, and day after day its whirl accompanied the production of little garments whose price in the shops seemed prohibitive to one of Evelyn's thrifty habits. To provide for these children, Howard would have to go on working and so would she—that was the good part of it.

There was no longer any feeling of jealousy toward her husband's devotion to business. Growing old was no dreadful thing if one had the sense to find a congenial occupation. Mothering was hers. Why, when these children were ready to go into the world, Elinor and Howard, Jr., would have married and she would have grandchildren! Now, there was no time to be idle with the two lively children on her hands.

Daily, morning and afternoon, they went to the parks in the crisp fall weather, and with folded hands Evelyn sat and watched them at play. Her cheeks had grown pink, her gray eyes alive with interest, and at Florence's request, she had arranged her brown hair in soft little puffs over her ears "like the girl in the picture." Something not found in a beauty-parlor had "done over" Evelyn Rockwell.

AT THE other end of her park bench, on an Indian summer afternoon, a man with yellow finger-ends turned abruptly toward her.

"I have something to say which will, I fear, grieve you, Mrs. Rockwell," he stated gravely.

A panic possessed her—ill news of what?

"I refer," he continued with studied suavity, "to my children, Jamie and Florence."

"Your children—" she echoed.

"Yes, I am James Sutter, and I have searched everywhere for them. It was only today that my wife and I succeeded in locating you. Cora did what she thought best and I, too, thank you for your kindness, but—I must have my dear babies."

Her hands clenched with the pain of the blow—to lose them now when the bond between had grown so strong!

A rouged woman, sharp-eyed and over-dressed, approached. "Let me bring the darlings here," she gushed, "I can hardly wait to get them home."

The children crowded confidently against their foster mother, happy, affectionate, yet faintly apprehensive of trouble from the look on her face.

"You don't remember me, do you, little ones?" purred the strange man.

Florence averted her face—she was always afraid of strangers—but Jamie stood his ground. "Yes, sir," he responded gravely, not "Uh huh" as he would have said a month before. "You're the man that followed us the day we came here."

His answer called forth a scowl on the stranger's countenance. "I'm your father, that's who I am, and you and your sister are going home with me," he decreed forcefully, forsaking his honeyed style of address.

The children cowered in Evelyn's arms. She forced her tongue to speak in cool argument. "You must produce proofs of your identity, of course, before I can give them up."

"I've got proofs—this lady is my wife and she knows who I am and I've got friends—right over there on that seat. Louis, come here, and you, Joe!"

Evelyn experienced a spasm of terror. She had no one at hand to protect the children or herself and she had not, as at home, a standing that would assure the authorities of her integrity. Long before she could find her friendly clergyman, this man might have spirited the children forever out of her reach. But, as the man turned to call up his cohorts, she glimpsed brick-red hair below his green hat, and Cora had said Jamie was just like his father—black-haired Jamie!

SHE prepared to play for time and a possible park-attendant. Having listened to Louis and Joe, who verified the claims of the man who called himself James Sutter, she was unprepared for the suddenness of his next move.

He reached a commanding hand out for each of the children. The result was deafening and he laughed grimly. "They don't seem to relish the idea of leaving you," he said. "It doesn't make much difference to you, I suppose, Mrs. Rockwell?"

At last, like a flash, his motive burst upon her. Money! He only wanted money, and he wasn't their father.

"Certainly, it means something to me," she replied coolly. "Would you be willing—for a consideration—to leave them and sign over adoption papers?"

She was leaning forward, eagerly.

"Well," he admitted with clever hesitancy, "I might, but we can't wait long, we must catch a train. You'll have to be quick. For five hundred—must be cash—"

"But I haven't that amount with me, of course. I will take the children back to the boarding-house and bring you the money."

"Not on your life! The kids stay with their parents, you go alone."

His apparent mastery of the situation led him to overplay. He laid a hand on Florence's shoulder and pulled her away from Evelyn's arm.

Instantly, the storm broke. The high-strung child screamed in a desperate, appallingly shrill outcry that was joined with Jamie's earsplitting shrieks for help. Evelyn, turned tigress, struck her fists furiously in the face of the offender and joined her cries to those of the frantic children.

His confederates hastily faded away and the counterfeit James Sutter would have fled also had it been possible. But fore and aft, he was dragged at and hampered and only released when an officer severely ordered Evelyn to "Let go and quiet those kids!"

Thus, one of the "happiest days" found Evelyn and her children hailed into police court for disorderly conduct and—still happy. Her clergyman would have gotten her out, but [she made no call for his assistance. To her, jail was the only safe place until Howard should arrive, although the matron assured her that the pseudo James Sutter was wanted on such serious charges of long standing, that he could never trouble her again.

Howard came at her wired command, "Come, all right, but need you at once." He liked to be needed. He was her standby in whatever had come up. And when he learned what really had come up and the children stood before him, confidently clinging to a sparkling-eyed mother who had magically lost the outer evidence of some ten or fifteen years, he still remained her standby.

"I guess I can afford 'em if you say so, Evvy. Oh, but The Springs have made a new woman of you!"

Evelyn crowded the children into a four-cornered embrace. "I haven't been near them, dear," she confessed, to his amazement, and later, when the jolly doctor heard the tale, he became jollier than ever.

"Well," he laughed, "she's cured anyway, and there are springs and—springs."

Something to tell the folks

ON the way home from business take your cue from the lobby of any theatre that displays the line "It's a Paramount Picture."

That's the big news to take home and tell the folks. That's the thing that will make them all say "Good! We'll go tonight!"

Just the way they shop for suits, rugs or motor cars.

It may seem strange to shop for such a romantic thing as a motion picture but good business methods turn out as well in buying entertainment as in buying anything else.

When you buy an automobile that bears the proud brand name of one of the greatest firms in the industry you are sure of the finest.

Why? The name!

When you go to a theatre which is showing a motion picture made by the foremost concern in the industry you are sure you are in for a great time.

Why? The name, Paramount!

The birds sing not more sweetly in early summer dawns than your heart when you see a Paramount love scene.

The terrible roar of tropic thunder is not more filled with a sense of awe than the greatest Paramount dramas.

To get entertainment so thrilling that boredom is dispelled like mist before sunshine, see Paramount Pictures.

They are announced in the newspaper advertisements, and in the lobbies, as Paramount Pictures.

That is how the best theatres everywhere may be distinguished: it is the pride of delivering the best.

If it's a Paramount Picture, it's the best show in town.

Particularly When There Is a Friend in a Time of Need

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"GOD'S in His Heaven," sang the soprano, and the thrilling quality of her voice was like a high sweet bird note. "God's in His Heaven—all's right with the world!"

In the very back of the church, where the seats were free, sat the girl. She sat there ever so quietly, with her shiny blue serge skirt gathered close about her. Her face was thin and pallid, and her lips were nearly white. But her great dark eyes were vivid enough to make up for the lack of color in the rest of her face. And as she listened to the voice of the soprano her soul shone, like a lighted lamp, through the brown of them.

"God's in His Heaven." The arched ceiling of the church seemed to echo the words of the singer; "All's right with the world." The sunlight, shining through the impressive stained-glass windows, seemed to throw back the song. But the girl in the back of the church shivered suddenly, as if she were very cold, and her slim little hands clasped tight together in her shiny, blue serge lap.

The soprano sat down quietly behind the velvet curtain that screened the organ loft. The voice of the organ died away to a murmur. And the pastor, black-gowned, impressive, rose to his feet. All over the church people settled back into positions of greater comfort. And the sermon began.

All through that sermon ran a thread of hope, and faith. All through the fabric of it one could sense the tint of courage. But when the sermon was over, when the benediction had been pronounced, one listener had not responded to the inspiration of it. The girl in one of the rear seats rose quietly, like a little gray mouse, and stole out of the church. And in her heart, over and over again, sounded the words of the soprano's solo.

"God's in His Heaven!" rang the words, but "How can He be?" she questioned. "How can He be in His Heaven—and allow the world to be so torn with unhappiness? How can He sit calmly up there, looking down on our sorrows and disappointments? Perhaps," the thought came to her with a grim whimsicality, "perhaps it's because Heaven is so far away—perhaps that's why He thinks that all's right with the world! Perhaps that's why."

THE street that the church stood upon was one of the most impressive streets of the most impressive city. With a feeling of distaste, almost, for the great buildings that stood all about her, with a sensation of nausea toward the rich gowns of the passing women, the girl turned abruptly into a side street and walked, as rapidly as she could, away from the church.

"They don't know," she told herself fiercely, and the "they" included the soprano, the pastor, and the congregation that she had just left. "They don't know what it is to be hungry and discouraged and out of work! They don't know what it is to be alone in the world!" all at once her fierce young tone trembled.

There was a hurried step behind her, a very hurried step. A breathless voice called, softly—

"Oh, miss, wait a moment. I've been tryin' to catch up—"

The girl turned quickly, almost aggressively. As she turned she winked back a mist that clouded her vision, a mist that might have been tears. But surprise was in her expression as she saw that the owner of the breathless voice was a strange woman—a little woman with white hair, and a kind face that was a fine network of wrinkles.

"Did you call me?" she questioned, a shade blankly.

The little woman had paused beside her. She spoke in a voice that was still faintly breathless.

"Yes," she answered, cheerily, "yes, I called. I was sittin' with you—in th' same pew, I mean, in church. An' when you went I saw that you'd left your purse, an' I just felt as I had to catch up with you—to return it." Her little wrinkled hand extended a flat bit of leather.

The girl laughed, and the sound of her laughter was not in the least mirthful. "You were very kind," she told the little woman, "but you needn't have taken so much trouble. There wasn't anything in the purse." She laughed again, "There wasn't anything in the purse," she repeated, "But 'God's in His Heaven,' just the same. And 'All's right with the world!'"

The woman looked at her sharply. But when she spoke her tone was pleasantly commonplace.

"I saw you takin' in that song," she said, and the enthusiasm in her voice was almost girlish. "The singers, at that church, are fine. It's a real treat, any time, to listen to 'em!"

The girl assented wearily.

"Yes, they sing well," she agreed, "but—after all—why shouldn't they? They're happy, and they have jobs, and full purses. They have families and friends, too. Why shouldn't they be happy?"

THE woman seemed to be considering, for a moment. And then she spoke.

"Lot's of people," she told the girl, "who have all of those things aren't happy. Full purses and jobs aren't the only things. Of course," she sighed, "families and friends are more important. I know. I'm alone in the world, myself!"

The girl felt suddenly drawn to the little woman. It hadn't occurred to her before that there were other lonely people in the world.

"Oh, I'm sorry!" she said softly.

The woman's wrinkled face had broken, all at once, into a smile of surpassing radiance.

"Don't you be sorry," she said, almost gaily. "I'm a happy person. I've got a room on the next street. An' I have th' cutest kitchenette you ever see. An' I have a canary bird that sings the same song that th' lady sang in church. Why," all at once she was faltering, "why don't you come home with me this noon? Sunday dinners are lonesome things, alone!"

The girl was startled. It was quite evident even to the little old woman that she had had few offers of hospitality.

"Are you sure that you want me?" she questioned shyly.

The little old woman was laughing softly.

"We'll have hot biscuit," she said, "an' chicken. I got one on now stewin'. And I made cookies yesterday. Don't be silly, child—course I want you!"

There in the sunlight of the side street, the girl stared at the old woman. And as she stared a tear trickled down the side of her nose, and another followed it. And another.

"Oh," she choked. "Oh—you don't know how you've made me feel! I—I didn't know where my next meal was coming from. I didn't think that any one cared whether I starved or not! But you do—you do!"

The little old woman had linked her arm into the girl's. Her voice was all sparkly with good nature.

"An' God does," she said gently, "don't forget Him! What the lady sang, in church, was dead right. . . . Say"—sudden excitement shone in her eyes, "my room's big, real big! You can stay with me, if you want to, till you get a job. It won't be so long before you get one! An' it'll be jolly to have a friend stayin' with me. . . ."

The girl's face was no longer colorless. Her cheeks were softly flushed, and her lips were warmly pink.

"All's right—with the world!" she murmured.

They walked off together, arm in arm.

Brazil's Corn Missionary

By GEORGE L. MOORE

THE text of his work is something to this effect:

"There shall grow in Brazil five ears of corn where before there were none."

And the result of his preaching is found in the fact that Brazil is now producing the fattest hogs South America has ever seen, and great pails of lard are being exported to London and to New York.

The preacher is Benjamin H. Hunnicutt, director of an agricultural school in connection with the Evangelical Institute of Larvas, Minas Geraes, Brazil. He has been preaching from his text since 1907, and now he has a large and respectful congregation who stand with their forty-centimeter sombreros at parade rest while he expounds the lesson with the aid of a 1920 model, stem-winding plow.

Being a Southerner, Mr. Hunnicutt believes in corn, so when Dr. Gammon, president of the Evangelical Institute glimpsed the possibilities of improved agriculture in Brazil, and sent for this young agricultural graduate to help him, Mr. Hunnicutt began on the theory that the country's corn yield should be increased.

But a little dive into statistics, which were few and far between at that time, showed that in Brazil the average yield of corn per acre was already about twenty-seven and a half bushels. At that time the average yield in the United States was only twenty-seven bushels per acre, so Mr. Hunnicutt decided that the first step was to increase the acreage devoted to corn-raising rather than to try to add to the yield.

And the first step in building a new national corn crib for Brazil was to check importation. For several years previous to the time Mr. Hunnicutt began his work of spreading the corn gospel, Argentine had been sending into Brazil thousands of dollars' worth of corn and corn products every year.

Yet every one of the 1,278 counties of Brazil are capable of growing corn in abundance. In fact, they are now beginning to produce. In 1918, instead of importing half a million dollars' worth of corn and corn products as she did in 1914, Brazil sent a million dollars' worth of corn and its products to other countries.

HAVING had a hand in stopping the carrying of coals to Newcastle, Mr. Hunnicutt went to work at the twin task of increasing the quantity and quality of domestic production. All this is easy to write in a sentence, but doing it was not so effortless by any means.

To begin with the missionaries had to combat the very fecundity of the Brazilian soil. Seed has a positively uncanny way of coming up down there. Even the primitive crooked-stick plow will produce crops. And with a land which naturally breaks into laughter whenever the surface is tickled, what is the use of really working at farming?

That was the natural philosophy of the Brazilian farmer, and his method of corn-planting had been in keeping with his creed.

The system most in vogue was to pick out a likely bit of timberland, light a fire, allow it to spread into the woods and then sit down and wait until a good-sized spot had been burned reasonably clear. Around corn-planting time in August the Brazilian countryside was heavily overhung with smoke and dust, and carbon particles filled the air for miles about a prospective corn-field. When the ashes were reasonably cool, the sower went forth to sow.

It has not been customary to select the seed, but to take whatever is left. The sowing is seven to twelve grains to the hill. Few weeds grow in the virgin soil and only two or three hoeings are necessary. The corn grows to a height of twelve feet. Because of the fallen tree trunks and charred masses of timber it is impossible—or has been, for the missionary agricultural school is helping to put all the old methods in cotton—to cut the corn. The peons and peonolas—or whatever they call them—go through the "fields" and break off the stocks by hand. Making corn grow was so easy that introducing cultural methods seemed like painting the lily.

Nevertheless, Mr. Hunnicutt and his associates have labored at improving corn.

One of the first results of their influence was the establishment of national corn shows. In 1914 the plans for a regular Iowa corn rally, Brazilified were urged through Chacaras e Quintaes, a farm publication. There were fifty-five exhibits at the first show. The next year the number jumped to 450, the next 1,000 and the fourth year there were 2,000.

The show is a movable feast, and has influenced thousands and thousands of farmers throughout Brazil. At the last one held in Rio de Janeiro there were 70,000 people. Wealthy land-owners in their automobiles, small farmers, swain and swainness bow the knee to King Corn, munch the Brazil equivalent for "hot dogs," inhale the fragrant pink lemonade and talk seedling, cultivating, lard yield per pound, and the latest design in seeders.

The exhibits of modern agricultural machinery have had an incalculable part in making the crooked stick archaic for even the lowliest Brazilian farmer. Mrs. Hunnicutt helped her husband by teaching the housekeepers all sorts of tricks for adapting corn tastily to the Brazilian bill-of-fare.

BESIDE preaching modern machinery, he has through the school propagated the doctrine of better and selected seed. Certain types of seed can not be used in Brazil because of the weevil. Mr. Hunnicutt has developed seed selection in corn-raising so that the general quality of the corn has been greatly increased.

Thirty to forty per cent. of Brazil's corn yield goes into hogs. A large share of the $1,000,000 corn export left the country, therefore, in the lard pail. The nurture and education of the hog has been a substantial part of the agricultural preacher's concern. And since statistics have been cultivated, along with corn and hogs, Brazil can point with pride to 18,000,000 porkers rooting on farms. Mr. Hunnicutt and the Larvas school seek to uplift them, increase their quality and weight, and widen the girth of the nation's lard-pail.

The introduction of several breeds of hogs has already influenced the hog-improvement. And Mr. Hunnicutt hopes to extend the influence of scientific hog-raising to such an extent that Brazilian hogs will be the kind even a Prodigal Son might leave with regret.

A More Responsible Tire Service —How Can You Get It

ALL of a sudden, thoughtful motorists have gone cold on tire-selling schemes and tryouts.

These are times when they are looking for a tire that will lower their tire cost—that will deliver economy, tire after tire and keep on delivering it year in and year out.

And they are expecting more of dealers.

They are taking their business to the man who understands their tire problems, and who sells the kind of tires that will solve these problems.

Now, a careful buyer is quick to see that the dealer who carries a mixture of tires cannot be expected to speak with conviction or authority about any one of them. His loyalty is divided. His responsibility not yet fixed.

The merchant who carries one full complete line of tires is a man who proves to his community that he believes in his goods.

THE U. S. CHAIN TREAD

One of the few tires of which it may be said that they deliver economy year in and year out and tire after tire. The U. S. guarantee is for the life of the tire and not for any limited number of miles.

The U. S. Chain Tread gives sufficient traction on all ordinary road surfaces. It is probably the handsomest, and by all odds the most popular, of the whole U. S. Fabric Tire line.

He is the real tire authority, who invites public confidence, because he is thinking always of each individual car owner's interest—not of some part of his stock that he wants to get rid of.

These men are the pioneers of the new order in the retail tire business. It is for them that the United States Rubber Company created a complete line of tires on which they can stake their reputation—concentrating their efforts to the great advantage of everybody.

The real tire merchant knows that the complete concentrated line of tires is his one sure protection against loading up with a multiplicity of brands and the dangers of over-stocking.

For the first time, he finds his stock investment down to a safe and reasonable basis. He now has a stock that can be moved quickly, and his customers are always sure of a fresh and current supply of tires.

These are the tire merchants who are thinking of your interest first. Think of them when it comes to your tires

What Is Real Religion?

B. Y. P. U. and C. E. Jas. 1: 19-27; John 17: 3

TO THE leader of this meeting we give a hint. There is always a tendency toward the abstract. Try to hold the program to the practical aspects of religion. Religion is not given a full definition in the couplet:

"Remote from man with God she spent his day, Prayer all his business, and all his pleasure praise."

This verse gives us a view of the contemplative aspect of religion. That kind of religion is good as far as it goes. But there is also the expressional aspect of religion. Religion is prayer and practice, doctrine and doing, emotion and motion. True religion makes an individual keen to hear the word of God and eager to manifest that word. It means that we are not dull to the heavenly vision and not "disobedient to the heavenly vision."

In the mind of Jesus religion meant service. "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." Meditation must lead to meditation and communion to communication. Strictly speaking the words "Divine Service" are not correct when limited to the worship of Sunday morning and evening. The worship of the Sabbath Day is only the preparation for the religious work of every day. The Divine Service that is held on the Sabbath day is the inspiration that prompts the Divine Service to be rendered on the week day. Faith and works are related. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." Jesus needs hands and feet and a tongue in this world. Dedicate your hands and feet and tongue, for the greatest good for the greatest number. "Jesus alone can save the world but Jesus can not save the world alone." "Ye are witnesses." "As the Father has sent me, even so, send I you."

Thy Kingdom Come—in My Home

E. L. Matt. 6: 7-15

FIRST of all, let us get a true conception of the topic. What do we mean by "Thy Kingdom Come—in My Home?" Let the members discuss this question. The more of yourself that you put into a thing the more will you get of that thing for yourself. This is a good slogan for the members. Having discussed the topic everybody contributing his or her bit, let somebody good at reading or reciting, render the following:

"We must get home and remembering there,
All gain of all ambition elsewhere.
Rest from the feverish victory and the crown
Of conquest whose waste glory weighs us down—
Fame's fairest gifts we toss back with disdain.
We must get home. We must get home."

Or some other selection from "Songs of Home," by James Whitcomb Riley.

Find out all you can concerning the great mothers and fathers of history and the influence they had on posterity through the home Susannah Wesley, for example, and the home at Epworth, from whence came John and Charles Wesley. Read "The Cotter's Saturday Night," by Robert Burns, for a splendid exposition of God at the fireside. The people in whose breasts are love for home and love for God are people all but invincible. Out of the home come the world-builders, world-savers and world-teachers. How important then that these homes of ours be Christian. If God's will be done in the earth, it must first be done in the home.

The Lord's Supper

Matt. 26:14-30

By LUTHER DENNY WHITEMORE, Litt.D.

THE Last Supper, of which Jesus partook with His disciples on the very night on which He was betrayed, the last night of His earthly life among men, is an event which requires not so much comment as meditation. The event itself, so full of pathos and tender associations, the simple and touching record written by some of those who were present, the precious words of Jesus preserved by the apostle John, the observance of the Lord's Supper through all the centuries down to the present time, combine to make the occasion one of the most memorable in the life of Jesus and in all the history of the Church. It was an occasion which could never be forgotten by those who participated in it, and which never can be forgotten by those who have partaken of the communion in remembrance of the Lord.

In the narrative of Matthew, as has been noticed frequently, strongly contrasted scenes are brought together in such a manner as to intensify the impression made by each. Thus the feast at the house of Simon the leper in peaceful Bethany, where Jesus was among His friends, follows closely the scenes of conflict in the distracted city, where Jesus was in the midst of enemies; and the devotion of Mary, who offered her costly gift with uncalculating love, seems to have given the culminating impulse to the avaricious Judas, who immediately bargained to betray his Master. The motive of Judas, however, is not clear. Perhaps he was among the disciples who desired high places in the expected kingdom, and disappointed in this expectation, Judas may have thought that to abandon the post cause before the final catastrophe was the part of discretion.

The preparation. In the preparation made by the disciples who came to Jesus to ask where He wished to eat the Passover, there is no suggestion of apprehension or unusual agitation. It was assumed that the intimate group of the disciples would together celebrate the great Jewish feast, as they had probably done before. Jesus had evidently anticipated the request of the disciples, for He had already made arrangements with some friend, whose house was to be honored as no other house has ever been honored.

Here is a wholesome example of poise and self-command, which permitted attention to practical necessities, even on the verge of momentous happenings. Jesus would not permit the disciples to chatter and their intimate relationship to end, without the opportunity for parting words. Thus, thoughtful of them, as ever, He gave the simple directions for their common meal because He desired to eat the Passover with them.

The Passover. It is significant that the Last Supper was a part of the celebration observed by all loyal Jews in memory of their great national deliverance from the period of Egyptian bondage and the beginning of their national history. In participating in his celebration Jesus showed that to the last He was loyal to His country and to the ideals which the great heroes of the nation had cherished. He was a true patriot, infinitely more devoted in act and spirit to the welfare of the people than were those who accused Him of disloyalty. Instituted as a part of the observance of the Passover and celebrated as a memorial of Jesus Himself, the Lord's Supper is the connecting bond between the old covenant and the new.

The attitude of the disciples. It seems almost incredible that the disciples could have failed to comprehend in fuller measure the situation which Jesus so clearly understood; but it must be remembered that no similar experience had ever come to them and that their human imagination was unable to represent what was so foreign to their past and to the expectation which they had concerning Jesus.

What He said they knew not then, but they understood it afterward; and it was well for them that their minds were clouded to that extent. Had it been otherwise, they must have been panic-stricken and unable to receive the last words of comfort and instruction which Jesus knew they needed.

With what surpassing tact and delicacy Jesus eliminated the traitor from the group before His final words were spoken to those whom He fully trusted! The words, "One of you shall betray me," took them by surprise, the eleven, because their consciences were clear; Judas, because he thought that his secret was secure. Every one began to say, "Is it I, Lord?" the readiness of the response proving their innocence. If Judas was the last to speak, his very hesitation was proof of guilt; for he waited to consider what he might say to cover up his thoughts. If Jesus knew the evil that was in the traitor, He also knew the good that was in the faithful; and in their presence He revealed Himself as He had never done before.

JESUS' self-sacrifice. The brief accounts in Matthew, Mark and Luke must be supplemented by the words of Jesus which were reproduced by John, in order that we may gain a complete understanding of Jesus' attitude toward His disciples and toward the fulfillment of His mission. Here it is explained why He laid down His life; for greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Jesus was the supreme example of love; and in words of unapproachable tenderness He declared His love for His disciples.

In remembrance of Him. What a wonderful privilege is ours and that of every Christian to do a simple act in memory of the Master! In asking the disciples to do this in remembrance of Him Jesus was not selfish, but considerate. He knew that when men understood Him they would wish to honor Him; but His great heart did not desire such memorials as are erected to commemorate the deeds of the world's heroes and mighty men. He wished His disciples to remember Him, not for His own sake, but for theirs; that they might always keep His ideals before them and that the thought of Him might be as common and as constant as the partaking of daily food.

In no act of His earthly life does Jesus seem nearer to His followers of today than in the Last Supper in the upper room, where He spoke the language of the heart, a language understood by every one who has experienced another's love or loved another; and in no act of ours do we approach Him more nearly than in obedience to His last commandment: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

Because of the pressure of other duties, Dr. Whittemore has been compelled to relinquish the preparation of our Sunday-school lessons. The Christian Herald has been fortunate in obtaining as his successor Rev. Samuel D. Price, D.D., of Montclair, N. J., long recognized as an authority on Sunday-school work. A graduate of New York University and of Princeton Theological Seminary, he was an active pastor for several years, until in 1917 he was called to be assistant to Dr. Frank L. Brown, General Secretary of the World's Sunday-School Association. He has been identified with Sunday-school work for more than twenty years, and his broad experience has included the teaching of community classes for teachers as well as classes for adults.

If the Schoolhouse Were to Burst into Flames

IMAGINE the scene of horror that would ensue; the exits menaced; the attempts of the teachers to maintain order and get the pupils out of the building without confusion or hysterical panic; probably serious injuries or even loss of life in the mad rush to escape.

Think of the desperate but futile efforts of the fire department using old-fashioned, out-of-date fire apparatus to check the blaze. The next day the paper would tell the old story of the disastrous fire, the lives of several children lost, and the still more common story of the lack of modern fire fighting equipment.

If the town were protected by American-LaFrance Fire Apparatus mounted on a Ford chassis, this speedy little car would arrive at the scene of the fire within a few minutes after the first alarm, almost instantly a stream of chemical forty times as effective as water would be playing on the blaze. The flames would be extinguished before any young lives could be snuffed out; the building but slightly damaged; the tax payers saved thousands of dollars.

More than 700 towns have already learned the efficacy of this thoroughly modern fire equipment. How is your town protected? Would you feel safe if the fire alarm should ring today? If not, enlist the aid of other prominent citizens. Fill out the attached card with their names and let us tell them about fire fighting.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

DURING the past week many letters have come to the Christian Herald Prayer League requesting supplication for revival. A reader in Kimmell, Ind., asks the prayers of the League in behalf of their church. She writes: "It is rapidly going to pieces, because of old grudges and little misunderstandings between the members. Pray that we may have a great spiritual awakening and a glorious revival."

"I wish to ask prayers for a revival at Kamiah, Idaho," writes, "One who believes in prayer." "There is such indifference to religious matters," the writer adds. "There are quite a few children in the Sunday school, but very few adults."

"Pray for me," writes Mrs. P. Florence, Ala., that I may be restored to health again, if it is God's will; also that we may have a revival in our church this year."

Reader, Alden, Kans., writes: "May I ask the Prayer League to pray that the Lord might give us a heaven-born revival in our church," and Mrs. R. M. B., of Mobridge, S. Dak., asks prayers in behalf of the revival which they are planning for an early date.

A mother, in Curwensville, Pa., asks prayer for deliverance from a dreadful malady, and adds: "I also beg of you that while you are praying at the Throne of Grace you will ask God in all earnestness for a change of heart for my boy." Another mother asks prayers for a son in college, that he may keep a pure heart, high ideals, and that his friends may influence him for good. Still another mother asks prayers for a sixteen-year-old son, who has given her a great deal of trouble, and who has now been sent to a reformatory.

A reader sends us this letter: "Have been hard of hearing for a few years and I miss the Gospel messages so much when attending church. I wonder if the League would pray for the restoration of my hearing. I have been praying for it a long time, and as I read the answered prayers in the Herald, I am impressed to write and ask the prayers of all the League. I am sure that God hears and answers in His own good way. A number of years ago I was sick and asked God to heal me. I promised to write and acknowledge it. I never have done so; as my recovery was slow, I think that is the reason. I was expecting a sudden healing. God sent it, but slowly. Now I want to acknowledge it as I promised."

L. S., Ohio, writes: "My husband has been in the Christian ministry twenty years. A man of strong faith, he has had the joy of seeing a number made well through earnest prayer. A malady has overtaken him, which a physician can do very little to relieve; only God himself can make him the strong man he was. I beg of you to send a hurried and strong call to the earnest brothers and sisters in prayer. His life must be saved for service. May God answer your prayer and mine."

Among the individual requests received are 89 for healing; 64 for conversion of relatives and friends; guidance, 25; spiritual advancement, 17; success, 7; peace, 9; and requests known only to God, 15.

Mrs. E. H., Morgansville, Ky., writes: "Some time ago I wrote regarding prayers for my sister and her daughter, who were in the hospital without hope. Since then my sister has recovered and is at home, and her daughter is improving. Now I come again, to acknowledge God's goodness and to ask the League to pray for my family. Pray earnestly that my children may find strength to resist the temptations that come upon them; that they may not yield to wickedness and that my home may be a godly home."

We have also received acknowledgments of answered prayer from Mrs. W. B. S., E. F., A. H., Mrs. J. C. L., and L. E. A.

Self-Denial to Aid China

Church People Limit Diet in Order to Contribute for Starving

THE Church People Limit Diet in Order to Contribute for Starving in China by actual, personal self-denial appears to be spreading all over the country. No feature of the response which has been given to China's pathetic appeal is more gratifying than this—that Americans, and especially American church people, are willing to give to their hungry brethren in China not only out of their superfluity, which is easy, but out of what are commonly, though often erroneously, regarded as the necessities of life.

Already it has become difficult to attribute credit for the original suggestion of giving to China the proceeds of personal self-denial. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt urged the idea at the China Bowl luncheon in New York, when she suggested that American housewives should eliminate some customary article of diet or some delicacy from the family dinner-table and give the money so saved day by day or week by week to the American Committee for China Famine Fund.

A similar appeal has been made to members of the Protestant Episcopal Church through the columns of The Churchman. The Churchman some time ago made the suggestion that the Lenten season could not be more profitably observed than by exercising self-denial in the matter of diet and setting aside the money that would otherwise have been spent on superfluous food for the benefit of those who have no food at all. The appeal has met with a wide response.

FROM Delaware there has come to the Christian Herald a remarkable story of what a single church has been able to accomplish through the self-denial of its members. The plan was suggested by the Rev. R. C. Helfenstein, pastor of the People's Christian Church, of Dover, Del., who writes as follows:

"After reading in The Christian Herald of the tragic situation in China, I pondered over a way whereby our church could have a worthy part in responding to the need of the starving Chinese. The thought came to my mind just as I stepped before the Sunday School assembly to ask for an offering, to ask how many of the men, women and children would be willing to go without dinner on Wednesday of the following week and give the money that the meal would have cost as a minimum offering for the China Famine Fund. I presented the situation as it exists in the famine area and then put the proposition as suggested. The response was unanimous, from the oldest to the youngest. The offer was so gratifying the following Sunday and the spiritual blessing so great for all who participated that a number of the men of the church and myself felt that such an idea should be put into operation weekly until after the harvest there was over, and that we should include in our objective the starving of Armenia and Central Europe. Hence, I drew up a form of covenant asking all who would pledge themselves to fast for one meal each week for six months and give the amount that the meal would have cost as their weekly offering for the starving Children's Fund to sign the covenant.

The response was of course not so universal as was the response to fast for one day. However nearly a hundred people of all ages and from every walk in life entered into the Covenant.

"The plan has been tried now long enough to prove its practicability. The interest keeps up with wonderful vigor. In the seven weeks thus far the average offering has been $69.83 as a result of the fasting in the interest of the world's starving. This is known as the sacrificial offering which is over and above the regular pledges to the local work and missions. The plan has quickened the spiritual life of the church, all the other offerings of the church and Sunday school have been increasing, and the interest of the people in missionary work has been enlarged.

"The plan is practicable for any church or Sunday school, and if adopted by the churches throughout the country, millions of dollars could be thus raised, millions of lives saved, and many of the churches of our own country would be revived in this practical expression of Christian faith. I believe most sincerely that if the Christian Herald would present the plan and the foregoing facts to its readers that hundreds of the different churches throughout the country would adopt the plan, because it seems to appeal especially to the laity."

The covenant also carries a pledge for daily prayers for China. This section reads:

"We further covenant ourselves to pray during the fast hour in behalf of the suffering millions and to pray that the people of America among all classes will give generously and prayerfully to this, the greatest need the world has ever witnessed.

"It is suggested that those observing the fast gather around their bare table at the meal hour to pray. Even the children who are six years old or more can well enter into this experience, as it will impress upon their minds the gratitude they should have for their daily blessings, which they naturally assume will always be theirs. The sight of the bare table will impress upon the minds of the whole family most forcibly something of the feeling of hopelessness that must come over the people in that distressed land whose tables are bare not only for one meal but for every meal—hungry, but having no food for that meal, and knowing that there will be none for the next, or the next, or the next, unless the Christian people of America send it, they continue to pray that we will send them bread."

CONTRIBUTIONS to the Christian Herald relief fund have continued to mount steadily toward the $500,000 mark. The daily record of contributions for the succeeding week was as follows:

February 10	$3,987.29
" 11	2,818.19
" 14	6,092.73
" 15	2,448.86
" 16	2,945.62

Grand total $455,479.10

Age-Old Mistakes Are still made in teeth cleaning

Countless people who brush teeth daily find they still discolor and decay. The reason is, they leave the film—that viscous film you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

That film causes most tooth troubles. To clean the teeth without removing it is one age-old mistake.

Film ruins teeth

Few people escape the trouble caused by film. Those troubles have been constantly increasing. So dental science has spent years in seeking a combatant.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Combat it daily

Modern science has found ways to combat that film. Able authorities have proved them by many clinical tests. Now leading dentists everywhere advise their daily application.

The methods are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And to millions of people it has brought a new era in teeth cleaning.

Other essential effects

Pepsodent brings other effects to accord with modern dental requirements. Right diet would also bring them, but few people get it. So science now urges that the tooth paste bring them, twice a day.

Each use of Pepsodent multiplies the salivary flow. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling and may form acid. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay. Another ingredient is pepsin.

These results are natural and essential. Millions of teeth are ruined because people do not get them.

Watch the change which comes when you use Pepsodent. Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears. Read in our book the reasons for each good effect. This test will change your whole conception of clean teeth.

The Financial Story of 100 Average Americans

By LUTHER D. FERNALD

Treasurer of the Christian Herald

FROM the United States Census reports, the American Bankers' Association has made an exhaustive study of the financial condition, through life, of the average American man.

The results have, for simplicity, been worked out by the bankers' association in the form of "the life experience of 100 average American men," as follows:

100 average men, healthy and vigorous in mind and body and dependent upon their own exertions for their support.

AT AGE 35

5 have died.
10 have become wealthy.
10 are in good circumstances.
40 are in moderate circumstances.
35 have not improved their condition.

AT AGE 45

11 more have died; 16 in all.
4 only are wealthy; all the others rated at age 35 as having resources having lost their accumulation.
65 are still working and are self-supporting, but without other resources.
15 are no longer self-supporting, owing to illness, accident, etc.; a few still earning something, but not enough for self-support.

AT AGE 55

46 more have died, 20 in all.
1 has become very rich.
3 are in good circumstances; but not the same 3 quoted at age 45, for one who was wealthy at 45 has lost everything, and another not quoted wealthy at 45 has taken his place.
46 still working for their living, without any accumulation.
30 are now more or less dependent upon their children, their relatives or upon charity for support; some still able to do light work are being replaced by younger men.

10 more have died, making 36 in all out of 100.
1 is still rich.
3 are wealthy, 1 of those who lost everything before 45 having again become wealthy.
6 still at work, self-supporting.
54 are dependent upon children, relatives or charity.

27 more have died, making 63 in all, 60 of whom left no estate.
2 only are wealthy, three who were rated as wealthy at 65 have lost their accumulation.
35 are dependent upon children, relatives or charity.

These old men will die off rapidly, but their financial condition will not improve, and 33 of them will not have sufficient means to defray funeral expenses unless insured.

SELDOM has there been presented so emphatic evidence of the need for individual thrift, steadily applied year by year.

Never in the past half century has there been such a financial reward, in high interest rates yielded by good bonds and preferred stocks, as are offered to the thrifty man right now. Money saved and invested now will yield nearly double the annual return possible in previous years. Accordingly, money invested—with interest reinvested, and thereby compounded—will double itself nearly twice as soon as in previous years.

The premium on thrift is, then, obviously greater than ever before. When thrift is so richly rewarded, why should any man today fail to provide against being one of that majority of average men who die without any estate for their dependent relatives, or reach old age "dependent upon children, relatives, or charity?"

With the soundest securities in the world crying for purchasers at bargain prices because of the temporary exhaustion of capital during the great war, there is no reason for risky speculation. The man who saves can invest his money safely, at high interest rates, and for long periods of time.

is, can not undertake this service for 315,000,000 people. The only solution is to teach them to help themselves.

SOME of us have thought of missionaries as having their eyes so fixed on the skies that they can not see the common needs of mortals. Persons who imagine this should read Sam Higginbottom's letter on how the missionaries took part in the Gwalior Exhibition:

"Mr. Griffin with his tractors actually plowing, his harrows harrowing, his pumps pumping, his fine crops of pedigreed wheat and grain, proved an attraction superior to the wrestling arena. Dr. Kenoyer in his beautiful research laboratory with experiments of all kinds under way that the Indian farmers could see and understand, his charts, microscopes, seed-testing, was more popular than the Indian juggler who makes the mango tree grow and bear fruit under a gunny bag.

"Mrs. Wiser with her demonstrations of fruit-canning and vegetable preservation, showing the people of India a cheap, sanitary and easy way of saving food, was much more popular than the nautch girl. The Maharajah brought down the ladies of the Palace to see and learn her methods. A few days after Mrs. Wiser had shown the Rani and Princesses how to can and put up food the Maharajah sent them back to demonstrate to Mrs. Wiser how well they had learned their lessons. He wanted to be sure they had got it right, as he will have to eat the things they put up.

"Mr. Slater came over with a lot of his chickens from Etah to manage the poultry part of the Exhibition. It was the best poultry show I have ever seen in India."

Missionaries introduced the steam engine in India—also the X-Ray—the improved plow called, "the machine-that-does-the-work-of-ten-wives"—a fly-shuttle which enables the home weaver to do four times as formerly—and many other devices vitally needed by India. Missionaries are teaching the tilling of the soil, the raising of stock, preparation of foods, care of the body, mental enlightenment and spiritual growth. They are helping to build an India which shall answer the prayer of India's great poet, Rabindranath Tagore:

"Where the mind is without fear and the head is held high;
Where knowledge is free;
Where the clear stream of reason has not lost its way into the dreary desert sand of dead habit;
Where the mind is led forward by thee into ever-widening thought and action—
Into that heaven of freedom, my Father, let my country awake."

"Religious Book Week"

A CAMPAIGN to promote a wider interest in religious books, in which many leading publishing firms have united, is announced to take place during the week from March 13 to 20. It is to be known as "Religious Book Week." Ministers throughout the country are urged to emphasize in the churches the need of such a campaign, and publishers generally will advertise and display religious books during that week. There will be a great assortment of Bibles, prayer-books, and other devotional volumes in the days immediately preceding Easter. Churches will receive posters direct from the publishers, if they offer to co-operate; also window-cards and labels announcing volumes on "Christianizing America," reconstruction, labor problems and religion, educational reform, religious biography, religious classics, personal religious life, books of comfort, immortality, sermons, helps, outlines, Bible stories, etc.

Sermonettes For Children

SOME years ago, a minister in Brooklyn introduced into his morning service a children's sermon. Just a five-minute talk it was, in plain and understandable language, intended solely for the small folks. There was a special act of childish appeal, and he chose simple, natural truths to illustrate his points and drive home the lesson intended. At the conclusion of this sermonette, the congregation rose and sang hymn while the little folks were allowed to go out of the church. After their departure the service resumed its usual form.

This wise man realized that the fidgeting and restlessness which generally characterizes children's church attendance is due to the fact that there is nothing of interest to hold their attention. The sermon intended to reach the full perception has no attraction for the little folks. They do not understand the language in which it is spoken! And so he decided to select a style of talks and texts with action, which would appeal to them. He wanted to draw them to church, but he wished them to come of their own volition. He certainly succeeded, and not only did the youngsters enjoy those sermonettes, but also the adults. We all are only grown-up children, really, and I am sure that some of his lessons made a deep impression upon the big folks of the congregation. I well remember how I used to hurry from home for fear of missing those talks!

I have often thought that many men of the present day are not church attendants now, chiefly because their parents dragged them, as children, to a dry, uninteresting sermon of which they understood not a word.

In Sunday school the child is kept interested, and his desires are gratified, in order to draw him thither. Why, then, doesn't the minister try the same plan in securing their attendance at his morning service? Having found these sermonettes so enjoyable, the lad gradually, as he gets older, forms the desire to stay and listen to the adult sermon—then indeed, can the minister be proud, when he has thus succeeded in drawing him to church.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

IT IS evident that sentiment against the dance is growing. We can only devote space to a few of the letters received on this subject; but in these the expressions are strong and positive.

A. A. F., Chicago, Ill., writes: "Why do Christian people take such a negative stand on the question of the dance? I think seven out of ten Christians, if asked their opinion of this prevalent pastime, will answer in an unconcerned and careless manner something like this: 'Well, I don't know, I've always had my doubts about it; but then it seems to be the fashion nowadays; and of course the young people must enjoy themselves some way.' There is absolutely no conviction expressed, but I believe that every true Christian's conscience will surely condemn dancing in any shape, form or manner. Aside from conscience, cold facts as set forth by many competent authorities will convince the most skeptical. I wish every Christian would read Rev. Beowulf's book: 'The Christian's Attitude toward Amusements.' Why do professing Christians dance, and permit their children to do so?"

C. E. Van Atta, Tekonsha, Mich., writes that the people there wish to secure a pastor for the charge of their Union Church, composed chiefly of Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists.

A. W. A., Marcellus, N. Y. 1. Although the migration of the Hebrews to Palestine is considerable, it is not unrestricted. 2. Jerusalem was surrendered by the Turks to Gen. Allenby on December 8, 1917. 3. A good deal of reclamation work including extensive irrigation, is now under way, and when this is finished, the most favorable results are anticipated. We have no statistics concerning last year's crops.

To "One in Doubt," Dubuque, Ia., we would say that the discussion over dancing has assumed a new and acute form since the fact became known that a convention of dancing masters had given to a new dance the honored names of John and Charles Wesley. Such a course was capable of but one interpretation, and now the dance is under a heavier fire than ever, and not from the religious press alone. The New Orleans Times-Picayune declares that "the present period of dance degradation . . . is striking at our boys and girls, our young men and women, and thus at the very roots of our future society." A New York amusements journal, discussing dancing halls, expresses this conviction: "We do not fear to state that in our opinion most of these places are notorious incubators of vice." We can not see how anyone professing Christian principles can hesitate to condemn the modern dance by letting it severely alone.

R. N. M., Ellijay, N. C., writes: "The Mail-Bag discussions of what attitude Christians should take toward such amusements as dancing and card-playing have interested me so much that I wish to have my say on the matter. Some of us spend time wondering whether certain lines of conduct are allowable when we should have our minds busied with things that are positively good. Christianity is affirmative. In reading the New Testament, one may be surprised at how often the words 'go' and 'do' occur. Christ 'went about doing good.' A patriot does better than merely keep from breaking the laws of his country. He tries to influence others to be law-abiding; and he lives such a noble life that foreigners will honor his country because of him. Likewise, the man who is loyal to Christ's kingdom, must be careful about what others think of his actions. A strong-minded Christian may feel that dancing will give him some needed recreation without bringing him into temptation; but one who is naturally a weaker character, or who has received poorer training, may become intoxicated with the whirl of the dance, and so grow careless of spiritual matters. And such a person may tell you that he took up dancing because someone whom he admired as a noble Christian was also a dancer. Paul would say 'If dancing make my brother to offend, I will dance no more while the world stands.' Will the world honor God more because some of His worshippers dance and play cards? 'Whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God.' This does not mean that we should take no recreation, but that we should let even our play time belong to the Master. Those who have learned the joy and beauty of spiritual things, know that we can do this without lessening the pleasure of the rest period. When a Christian can not spend his rest period in some way that will be spiritually helpful to himself or others, he will have to consider what amusements are allowable. In that case, he should ask himself whether the thing he wishes to do will make any appeal to some appetite which should be controlled. The account of Israel's journey from Egypt contains this solemn sentence: 'And they buried there the souls that lusted.'

Reader, Denver, Colo. It is true that religions die—when they are not founded on principles that will stand the test of time, or are based on ignorance or superstition. A writer in the "Journal of Religion," Chicago, says that out of fourteen or sixteen faiths "each of which once commanded the unquestioned adherence of millions, only ten today survive." Among the ten he mentions two, Buddhism and Zoroastrianism, which no longer exist in the lands of their origin and are steadily declining elsewhere. A thorough survey of the field of decadent faiths would include not only the two mentioned but Shintoism, Jainism, Mohammedanism, and various forms of paganism, all of which have waned as Christianity has advanced.

J. R., Newburg, N. Y. The first mention of any Christian church in apostolic times is that in Antioch (see Acts 11:26). As to the building in which these early Christians first worshipped, nothing can be stated definitely. A writer in the London Times calls attention to a recent discovery of what may prove to be the earliest known church building devoted to the Christian faith. Under the direction of the Department of Antiquities, of which Sir Herbert Samuel is the head, excavations in the vicinity of the Garden of Gethsemane have resulted in the discovery of a church of the thirteenth century, while on a still lower level, were found the remains of a much earlier church, assumed to be of the fourth century. So far as known, this is one of the oldest monuments of Christianity in Palestine.

Rev. E. H. Parkinson, Kans., writes: "The union of Protestant churches is a Christian reform which is assuming larger and still larger proportions with the passing of every decade. The advance of other great reforms are only contributive to its substantial growth, so that today we are witnesses of an agitation in its interest, unlike in magnitude and intensity anything that has preceded it. To be sure, there is counter agitation, but that is only serving to call attention to what will inevitably have advertisement. Good results are already accruing, and these, after all, are the most effective publication of its great merits, and offer an unanswerable argument for the consideration of the prejudiced and doubtful."

Reader, Paoli, Ind. 1. There are various conflicting interpretations of Ezekiel's prophecies. Conservative commentators accept the visions of Ezek. 37 chapter as designed primarily to cheer up the desponding Jews in their captivity, and hold that prophesying over the dry bones was to quicken and restore spiritual life in a people who had become virtually dead. Many objections are raised to a literal interpretation of the chapters that follow. Principal Fairbairn, a thoroughly orthodox authority, regards them as "a prophetic parable." Others hold that they reach far into the future and outline the havoc "to be wrought by the anti-Christian confederacy and its ultimate overthrow." The latter part of Ezekiel is regarded by Bible expositors as obscure, some holding that its application must be confined to Messianic times, while others have regarded it in a different aspect, "as the vehicle of higher and spiritual import, setting forth the distant grandeur, glory and triumph of the Kingdom of God." There are many commentaries on Ezekiel. Write to Dr. J. M. Gray, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, who can advise you as to a choice of these. 2. Germany was the prime instigator of the world war, and consequently the troubles that have developed from it are logically charged to the same source.

If Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers, where's the peck of pickled peppers Peter Piper picked?*

PETER FIRST PICKED GOOD SEEDS

IT is not recorded where Peter got his particular brand of peppers, but there is one thing sure; he took care to plant pure-bred seeds. All good gardeners do.

Just where Peter put the peck of pickled peppers is now told for the first time: he "put them up"—"jarred" them—canned them. Winter was coming, and he was a little too independent to pay sky-high prices to somebody else who had the gumption to start a garden.

Peppers, peas or parsnips—whatever you like—you can have them at their best. Just start a garden. Plant Ferry's pure-bred seeds, of course. They all come from parent plants so carefully selected that they tend to produce in abundance vegetables of fine flavor and tenderness, or flowers of supreme color and vigor. Sixty years of experience help to take the guess-work out of Ferry's pure-bred Seeds. Plan to plant them.

Church Census Shows Great Gains!

All the Losses of 1919 More Than Overcome in 1920—An Inspiring Record of Spiritual Progress

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

Compiler of the First Complete Official Census of Religions in the United States judging from the reports of baptisms, which have reached the probably unprecedented figure of 165,000, with churches yet to be heard from.

THE Roman Catholic Church, whose gain of over 158,000 in 1919 saved the Churches from an absolute decrease, reports a somewhat smaller increase for 1920 of 127,579, or 153,093 of Catholic population. Doubtless when immigration sets in again its gains will be larger.

For consideration and careful comparison, the following table covering the gains of thirteen years, and including all denominations in the United States will be both interesting and valuable:

Year	Total Communicants	Gains
1908	33,885,287	323,391
1909	34,703,821	818,534
1910	35,245,296	541,475
1911	36,095,685	850,389
1912	36,624,462	528,777
1913	37,859,975	1,235,513
1914	38,641,982	782,007
1915	39,184,811	539,829
1916	39,941,811	757,000
1917	41,270,629	1,328,818
1918	41,430,153	159,524
1920	42,140,997	667,007

Note the unexplainable vacillations in the returns, varying from 323,391 to 1,235,513 five years later, and from 1,328,818 in 1917 to 43,837 in 1919 and to 667,007 in 1920. Excepting the variations of the past four years very little in the way of explanation can be given the sudden rise and fall of these annual returns.

A glance at the returns will show that the Evangelical Churches have made large gains. In a subsequent issue these gains will be fully shown.

Notwithstanding the very encouraging returns in the number of communicants, losses continue in the number of ministers and of churches, in many of the denominations, as may be observed by the many "ds" scattered through those columns. There is a net loss in the Methodist group. The Methodist Episcopal Church lost 200 churches in 1920, 288 in 1919. The loss of churches for all denominations is 556 for 1920.

There is an increase in the aggregate of ministers, but many denominations report losses, notably the Lutheran, Presbyterian, United Brethren and Baptist bodies.

REFERENCE to the Summary on page 215 will show some interesting facts. In the first place, it occupies only one-fifth of the space required by the detailed table. In the latter are a great number of bodies, ranging from less than 100 members up to more than fifteen million members. The Summary embraces all the denominations included in the long table, but by grouping them according to family relation, as Presbyterians, Lutherans, Methodists, Baptists, Reformed, Friends, etc., they are all contained in 51 lines. If Adventists, Plymouth Brethren, Baptists, Lutherans and other denominational groups were each merged, instead of 170 or more distinct denominations there would be only fifty-one.

Is not this fact eloquent of what should be?

The second fact shown by the Summary is that the great bulk of membership of the churches is embraced in the groups. Look at a few of them:

Group	Members
Baptists	7,207,578
Eastern Orthodox	495,694
Roman Catholic	15,266,799
Disciples of Christ	1,493,515
Latter-Day Saints	452,797
Lutherans	2,493,894
Methodists	7,705,258
Presbyterians	2,255,693
Episcopalians	1,087,037
United Brethren	371,293
Adventists	134,725
Dunkards	134,179
Evangelical	209,047

Total 39,307,509

THE Churches of America in 1919 were in the Slough of Despond; in 1920 they are again on the Hills of Progress. What but the outpouring of the Spirit of God, in response to great evangelistic activity, could have wrought the change?

The rally from the heavy decreases in communicants which marked the returns of most of the churches in 1919, to bounding increases, indicates an angelic and parish activity of most hopeful port. The corrected returns of 1919, however, are seen to show a net gain of all the denominations less than 44,000—the smallest gain for the enormous denominational equipments of the United States, ever known.

There has been an immense leap in membership during the past year, showing gains from 44,000 to 7,000. How was this accomplished? It is evident that the setback of 1919 aroused the churches, and a campaign for souls succeeded the campaign for money. Is there a connection between the two, and so what is it? The result comes from great parish activity, for the public has heard little of tabernacle angelism in the past year. With every pastor engaged his duty in gathering in converts, the result must be great.

It is significant to note that the gains are largest in 1920 where the losses in 1919 were heaviest. Note these figures:

Losses in 1919	Churches	Gains in 1920
19,940	Methodist Episcopal	157,912
6,404	Methodist Episcopal, South	73,610
2,308	Presbyterian, Northern	31,958

Observe the gains by denominational groups:

Losses in 1919	Groups	Gains in 1920
5,951	Methodist Group	237,127
6,459	Presbyterian Group	43,031
1,103	Baptist Group	129,283

Although the three large Baptist bodies have not collated their statistics for 1920, from the best mates available it is evident that they have gained over 129,000 in the year. The increase will be particularly large in the Southern Baptist Convention,

This means that including only the groups of over 100,000 strong, and leaving out for the present purpose independent bodies like the Congregationalists, the Unitarians, the Universalists, the Jewish Church and others, all but 2,800,000 out of a total of 42,141,000 are covered by the above table. That is, there are only 2,800,000 not in the above groups.

Here is still another suggestion of great force. The glorious lesson is: Consolidate the members of each group.

The third act of interest is that the bulk of the increase for 1920 is to be found in these groups in the foregoing table, for example:

Group	Growth in 1920
Methodists	237,127
Catholics	151,434
Baptists	129,283
Presbyterians	43,031
Lutherans	31,389
Episcopalians	9,995
Total	602,259

These six groups report a total gain for 1920 of 602,259, out of a grand total of 667,007, representing the gain for all bodies. Does not this remarkable fact speak volumes for Christian Unity?

The fact that consolidation, as illustrated in the merging of the members of any of the great religious groups means strength and growth, need not be discussed here. Yet it stands out significantly, and suggests what results might be looked for if the merging of the members of each of the groups were accomplished.

A Visit to People Who Live as in Abraham's Day

By WILLIAM R. and ANNA
WHITE STEWART

(Of the Y. M. C. A. in Tokio, Japan)

SITUATED deep in the heart of Asia, the little-known country of Mongolia has remained one of the unoccupied mission fields of the world. It presents peculiar difficulties to the missionary, for the people of Mongolia are scattered over a tremendous expanse of territory in which the population averages only two to the square mile, and lead a nomadic life because their great herds of horses, cattle, sheep and camels require them to be on the move constantly.

It was not to seek new adventures that we made the journey into Mongolia—a journey involving 5,000 miles of difficult travel. We found a people of 3,000,000 sadly in need of Christian teachings and influences. Though the coming of the missionary has been delayed, so-called civilization, with many of its curses, is beginning to push into the country, and Russians, Japanese and Chinese have come in all along the railroad. Settlers soon will be flocking into these fertile fields and the Mongolian herdsmen, a race of the very highest possibilities, must be fitted through Christian education to meet the complex life of the new civilization, if they are to survive.

But, to begin at the beginning, it was through one of the resident members of the Tokio Y. M. C. A., the first Mongolian student ever to go to Japan, that we were led to visit this country. This young man made a splendid impression on us from the first, both in the class-room and in our home, where he was a frequent visitor. He told us many interesting facts about his home life, which he described as being much like the wanderings of Abraham in the land of Canaan, four thousand years ago; but when he told us that his nation was without any knowledge of God or Jesus Christ and pictured to us their great needs, we were impelled to go with him to do all in our power to help.

We broke our journey by spending Sabbath in that wonderful mission station of Peking, Korea. We also stopped off a day at Tsitsihar, the capital of Heilung-kiang (The Black Dragon River Province), the northern half of Manchuria. We arrived at Khailar, Manchuria, after twelve days of travel. Khailar is the governmental center of a large section of territory occupied by the Mongols. We spent nearly a week there in the home of one of the officials while our friend was trying to locate his family out on the plains. They move on an average of once in ten days, and have a range of about one hundred miles.

One of the Mongolian wigwams in the process of being taken down for moving. It is fifteen feet in diameter

DURING our enforced delay we were fortunate in being able to attend an "obo," an annual gathering of a social and religious nature, which brings together as many as a thousand Mongolian men and boys. There were present nearly all of the thirty-six Mongolian officials of that district. The event was held on a sacred hill seven miles from Khailar. From the top of this hill one could see for fifty miles in every direction over a landscape of unusual beauty.

We went to the encampment the night before in order to be in time for the day's events, which began at daybreak, and were much impressed with the cordiality with which we were received. We were the only Westerners present, with the exception of a Russian peasant who came the following day. They set aside for our use one of their guest tents, sent in hot meals to us, and were constantly at our service. Some of the younger officials had been appointed to this task by the head man.

We were awakened at dawn by the call to the horse-race. In the center of the encampment there was a mound of stones in which were stuck thirty or forty bamboo poles bearing brilliantly colored silk banners on which were printed prayers. Around this was circling a caval-

The Foeman in the Road

The Story of a Second Trial

By LESLIE GORDON BARNARD

Illustrated by M. L. Greer

IN THE chilliness of the early morning Harvey Richards silenced the sputtering of an insistent alarm clock, thrusting out a long arm to accomplish this, and following the movement by climbing carefully out of bed. Gathering up an armful of apparel he tiptoed quietly through the semi-gloom, across the floor and down the short corridor to the bathroom.

Here, by artificial illumination—the December sunlight not yet being on duty—he accomplished the task of dressing. It was cold—so cold that he shiveringly hurried into his things, even wishing he could dispense with shaving. He made a mental note to see to the diminutive furnace before going to the kitchen-dining-room, where presently he would prepare and eat his breakfast. Then it would be nice and warm for Sheila when she awoke. It certainly was unusually cold for early December.

From the bathroom door, as he came out, he saw an oblong of light at the front of the flat. The smell of frying potatoes came pleasantly to his nostrils. He went forward quickly, investigating.

"Sheila!" Remonstrance was in his voice. "You know very well you shouldn't have got up. I could fend for myself for once or so."

"Listen to him now, Dickie!" The girl addressed a sleepy-looking canary whose cage hung within the radius of warmth from the stove. "As if I'd be letting my man get his own breakfast of a morning."

"Besides, I'm not hungry this morning, Sheila, honest I'm not."

She disregarded his protests, setting a great bowlful of oatmeal before him, smothering it in rich, creamy milk, and sweetening it as she knew he liked it.

"Get that inside you, Harvey Richards," she commanded, "and lay a good foundation for what's coming."

He forced himself to eat against his will, because her eye was on him steadily. Presently, finding the warm porridge good for a cold morning, he recovered his appetite, forgetting the worries of which he did not speak.

WHEN the bacon and eggs and potatoes and coffee were served, Sheila took her seat opposite him, drawing her heavy wrapper more closely about her. He found her steady gaze rather disconcerting today, and she herself seemed nervous. Rising presently she drew aside the curtains from the window. Over beyond the regular rows of chimneys on the workers' homes, tints of orange and pink and gold lightened a steel-gray horizon, against which the tall stacks of the factories showed in bold outline.

"It's going to be a fine day, Harvey," she said. "I'm glad of that. You'll be going out to Chester's today, you said?"

"Either this morning or this afternoon." Harvey rose quickly, scraping his chair across the linoleum, taking a final gulp of coffee standing. He felt he could not trust himself to speak on this subject. Betrayal was barely kept from his looks; his words would surely give him away. The optimism of last night when he had listened to Sheila talking happily of the future he was to carve out was gone in the cold gray of morning. Whatever happened Sheila must not be worried with an understanding of the real conditions. How many times the little woman had held up his hands this last twelvemonth or so of married life! With her to inspire confidence troubles seemed to vanish. The hard thing was that he must fight his present battle alone.

"I'll not be in at noontime, probably," he told her, reaching for his hat and coat.

She nodded silently.

A slanting beam of sunlight found its way into the room, touching the ordinary furniture with something of its own splendor.

"Harvey, isn't that grand now? Listen to Dickie—he's singing his morning hymn of praise."

Harvey took the little woman very gently in his big embrace, kissing her tenderly on the forehead. He opened the door and started down the flight of steps, waving, with a gaiety he was far from feeling, a final farewell to her as she stood there in the doorway with the sunshine like a halo about her auburn hair. Suddenly the beam was withdrawn; a cloud dimmed the sunrise, sending the little room back into comparative darkness.

Harvey turned to continue his way down, but a little cry from his wife recalled him.

"Sheila—what is it, dear?" He felt that she was trembling, though her face upturned to his was smiling bravely.

"Nothing, dear, only I wanted you just to—to kiss me again."

This time he kissed her full on the lips, and left her. Sheila closed the door softly behind him. At the bottom of the steps he opened the street door and went out, joining the ranks of workmen hurrying to their day of labor. From a gray sky oc-

"It's probably out of order, but, well, it would take a squad of policemen to hold this young man down" casional flakes of snow sifted down. Harvey buttoned his coat more closely about him.

A WHISTLE on a nearby factory commenced to blow—a deep, full-throated warning; others took up the signal, adding their strident voices to the imperious call of the workaday world.

A common gateway serves as entrance to both office and workshop of the Caldwell Machinery Company, only in one case you continue up the low stone steps and through plate-glass doors with their gilded legends and in the other you swerve to the left, following the concrete runway into the great works at the back.

Harvey Richards was the only one of the crowd who surged through the gateway, to enter the office door. It was a good hour until the office staff would put in an appearance, but the habit of years is not lightly shaken off, and the mail-clerk, already sorting the letters inside, showed no surprise. For three weeks now, since Harvey had exchanged his overalls for the neat gray suit of a salesman, he had never failed to be first at his desk, poring over catalogues and price lists, familiarizing himself with things that had meant little to him in the past.

Perhaps there was just an element of pride in it, too. Even this morning the nods of his fellow-workmen held the faintest touch of respect—a respect they might not have paid had Harvey not been "through the mill" himself, and mastered the mechanical end of the business with satisfactory thoroughness.

One of the younger men gave him greeting today: "Good-mornin', Mr. Richards."

The prefix was a new recognition of success. Once inside the office, with his long legs thrust under the flat-topped desk that still held a fascination for him because it was his own—a little card above it announcing the fact by giving his name in neat black and white—the temporary elation faded. From a cardboard folio held down by a paperweight he drew the copy of a letter. Old Peters had brought it to him only last night, leaning over him with a sympathetic pressure on his shoulder as he read it. That was after most of the sales force had gone for the night.

"It's naturally not intended for your eyes," Old Peters had said, "but I thought I'd strain a point and let you see what you're up against. I wouldn't do it for everybody, only I think you've it in you to make good yet, and I want you to make good with a vengeance tomorrow." Peters was assistant sales manager, a position created for him because a lifetime of service and his failing health demanded recognition.

HARVEY glanced through the copy again now, reading the pertinent extracts—as though they were not already etched in his brain; as though, indeed, they had not been before him in his sleeplessness—letters of fire in the darkness; as though they had not followed into and haunted his fitful slumber. The letter was from the sales manager to Turpin, who headed up the Salesmen's Instruction Department, through which Harvey himself had passed.

"... looks as though you'd landed a dud on us this time. Would suggest in future a little more care in passing out candidates. A good workman may be a mighty poor salesman, although a salesman is doubly qualified if, in addition to selling ability, he has an intimate knowledge of the manufacturing end.

... Am willing to give him a last chance tomorrow, at the Chester Company. It may queer the order for us, but I'm willing to give him his fighting chance the same as I've done for others. Personally he's a likeable youth. If he falls down, though—it's back to the factory for him."

Even when your own conclusions spell failure it is a bit of a shock to find your employers in agreement with your self-verdict. Harvey didn't know whether to appreciate or not this act of Daddy Peters, however kindly intentioned. The question has been raised by humanitarians who cannot go the lengths of abolition, as to whether or not men condemned to capital punishment should be apprised of the day of their doom in advance! It is apt to be a trifle unnerving!

Harvey's mind ran to Sheila, and for the moment she filled his whole mental horizon. Sheila at least believed in him, would stand by him in his distress if she knew. Only Sheila must not be worried now. A few days more...

The memory of the little woman's farewell that morning came vividly to mind, its fervor and sweetness lingering. If it had not been for her and her inspiration he would never have attempted this—would still be content to be chained to workshop and bench. Sheila must never know the strange streak of fear that was like a rank growth in an otherwise decently cultivated nature. She should not know, because he must overcome it—live it down. The thing that made it hard was that he must fight alone. And then came an interruption:

"Mr. Richards, you're wanted in the office."

HARVEY nodded to the boy; consciously squaring his shoulders as he answered the call. Old Daddy Peters', coming out of the Sales Manager's office, nodded encouragement. Harvey entered, returning a mechanical greeting to Hodgson's crisp:

"Morning, Richards. Sit down."

Harvey seated himself nervously on the edge of a chair. The Sales Manager's disapproval showed in his face for just a flash. But he did not speak of the thing then.

"I'm sending you to handle this Chester matter today, Richards. It involves a considerable order for machinery. Several firms are competing. The purchasing agent already has specifications before him, but he wishes to see a salesman from each firm this morning. This afternoon he will turn in a report to his Directorate, who will pass on his recommendations. You are to represent us."

"Yes, sir."

"You will observe—" For fifteen minutes

Richards was lost in a maze of specifications and figures. Finally Hodgson concluded abruptly.

"Good," he said approvingly. "You've got a splendid grasp of the thing. Roper, of Chester's, is strong on detail, so you ought to hit the bull's-eye."

Harvey was not deceived. It is customary, he knew, to inoculate a salesman with "pep" before sending him to his trial by fire. In the familiar details of the last quarter hour he had forgotten himself; now the thought of the ordeal ahead rose up again to trouble him. The letter was too fresh in his mind.

Harvey stood up to go. Hodgson had run for his stenographer and was already sorting out the next matter demanding attention. Across on one wall, beside a day calendar, hung a list of maxims. The first quotation caught Harvey's attention. Hodgson, following his glance, spoke:

"That's the one most of us need at times, Richards. Let it soak in good, and the best of luck to you."

Harvey folded his papers and left the room. The quotation he had read came with singular force and meaning. He repeated it aloud:

"To doubt is failure and to dare success;
I find no foe man in the road but fear."

LATER, when he went out to his appointment, Mike Kennedy met him the passage. Mike lived in the flat below him: Mrs. Kennedy kept a motherly eye on the little Irish Sheila upstairs; her sister, too, was constant in her friendly ministrations.

"How's Mrs. Richards this mornin', sor?"

"In good spirits, Mike, thanks."

Mike scratched his head.

"I'm glad, sor, very glad. My missus seemed fair upset about her whin she come down from seein' her last night. These wimmen, sor, lose their nerve almighty easy at times. I mind wanst whin I was drivin' my truck a gurl gettin' in front—"

Harvey smiled and hurried on. Mike was a notorious talker. Only when Harvey was on the train that would take him—an hour's run—to his destination, did he recall Mike's words. Remembrance came to him of Sheila's fit of trembling as they parted.

Through the car window he saw the unlovely backs of squalid tenements as the train rattled past. Later open spaces gave bleak vistas of white, hedged about with gaunt, bare trees. Above, a leaden December sky seemed to press down upon the earth.

The old streak of fear within the man was touched. A sense of depression was upon him. In this mood he faced the interview with the Purchasing Agent, Roper.

Kipling speaks of triumph and disaster—or success and failure—as the "two impostors"—yet to those who taste the nectar of the one or the bitter of the other there seems, for the time at least, little savor of unreality. Of the two this fact is more applicable to failure.

To Harvey Richards, coming from a gruelling session with the P. A. of the Chester concern, the sense of disaster—of deep, dark failure, was the most real thing in life. He had presented his case with methodical accuracy, emitting few points, in spite of the nervousness that seized him from the moment he joined a half-dozen competitive salesmen awaiting in an ante-room their turn for an interview, and that made his tongue fairly cleave to the roof of his mouth when finally his time came to be ushered into the presence.

Now, in the comparative calmness of retrospection, he could put his finger on the weak spot. His presentation was cold—lifeless—unenthusiastic—because his warm, confidence had oozed and oozed until it left him a dry, cold bundle of arguments that lacked conviction because they lacked life.

FAILURE was written all over that interview. The adverse decision was as clear as if it had been spoken in as many words. Later he heard that two of the salesmen were asked to return in the afternoon, in case the Directors should wish to question them. He was not asked, though he knew his prices and product must compare favorably. The door of opportunity—an opportunity long sought, and paving the way to that goal of which he and Sheila had spoken so often—was shut in his face. Somehow he cared less for himself than for the little woman at home. She would be all sympathy, beneath her cheerful resignation the word "failure" would be ever there to mock her dreams, and shake her belief. He must, at any rate, simulate cheerfulness before her for some days yet.

It was a mercy Hodgson was out to lunch when he returned; at least he would not have to face an interview yet. Harvey left a brief note of explanation, in which there was no suggestion of condoning his failure.

From his desk in a railed-off corner of the main sales office Old Peters signaled him furiously. Harvey's face fell at sight of his troubled look.

"So—they telephoned the result, did they?" Harvey's question was listless. Old Peters waved an excited arm.

"Been telephoning all over town for you, boy. Get on your hat and coat and beat it—quick!"

"I—I don't understand. I've just come in from Chester's."

"Chester's? Great goodness, man, forget Chester's. Your wife —"

Harvey's face went suddenly gray. He looked his question because articulation was an impossible thing. Old Peters's sympathetic grip was on his arm.

"They only said they wanted you—quick. That was half-an-hour ago at least. Look—my car's outside. I'll run you home."

As they sped through the streets the one o'clock whistle was blowing, calling the workers back to the afternoon toil of shop and bench. For just a single flash it came to Harvey that after this imperious summons would be calling him back to the old rut again. Then the thought was blotted out. What did it matter? What did anything matter—except little Sheila?

A PALE-FACED woman met them at the curb. "You'd best be comin' in with me, sor," said Mrs. Kennedy, clutching nervously at Harvey's sleeve. "The Doctor said to be kapin' you here while. Plaze, sor, it's best. There's nothin' ye be doin' My sister's upstairs, too."

Old Peters's kindly, gray-whiskered face nodded confirmation. Together they led Harvey, protesting still, into the lower flat.

"I didn't know—it would be—so soon." The thought seemed hard to credit. Sheila had never hinted, to the Doctor—

"'Twas the little gurl's idea, sor, as I happen to know. She said you would be havin' yer own be to foight just now, and she's just foight hers. She's afraid you might be thinkin' her weak an' fearful, maybe superstitious—"

He caught at the word.

"Superstitious? What do you mean?" When she evaded his glance, refusing to answer, he took her arm almost roughly. She was greatly troubled at his insistence.

"Mr. Richards—I shouldn't have told ye now. She wouldn't have wanted it. Ye see, it seems her older sister, who married back in the ould land . . . went out . . . this way. . . an' the mother when Sheila was born. She's been worryin' an' thinkin' about it this while. 'Mrs. Kennedy,' she sez, only yesterday, 'ye'll not be forgettin' to pray for me?' 'Tis not myself

"A Batch of Boys"

WHAT shall it profit a community if it gain the whole world and lose its boys?"

It is my object to personify patriotism in personality. I believe it is a worthy work to direct boys over "Fool Hill." For this reason I am working with "A Batch of Boys," organized into a Boy Scout Troop. We have no panacea that cures all boys' problems, no paper program that works wonders, but concrete illustrations will show how we take the raw material—the boy—and work to produce manly men of the morrow.

As Roosevelt said of the Y. M. C. A., we "mix common sense with religion." We take what the boy likes and on to that we graft what he needs. For instance, the Woman's Auxiliary wanted to decorate the hall for a public function. How could its members obtain the greens and foliage needed for the decorations? The Scouts were told that this was an opportunity to do community work and practice good citizenship. They turned out a hundred per cent. efficient and delivered the goods in the form of half a hall full of leaves and foliage.

Later the sidewalks of our little village became unsightly and dangerous. Inasmuch as the little town is not incorporated it looked as if those walks were destined to remain that way until the owners should get time for repairs or some one had an accident. The danger of the situation was pointed out to the boys as they had their business meeting about the evening camp-fire. This led to the appointment of a committee to take this trouble in hand. Within a week the boys had investigated the sidewalks of the entire village and repaired all the dangerous places.

During the rush season, when it is all but impossible to hire help, the grass on the community church lawn needed cutting. When the trustees were baffled as to how to keep the grass from getting away with the situation, the matter was placed before the Scouts. It took only an hour for that Batch of Boys to give the lawn a clean shave, and the completion of the task was celebrated with a crackerjack feed. Several weeks later a large bulletin board was erected on this lawn, requiring the help of several extra hands for several hours. The Scouts saw a chance to do public service and several of them appeared to see the job through.

OUR boys enter into helpfulness in work that is larger than that of their immediate locality, as was the case when the library for this part of the county was making a drive for funds to buy new books. It was somewhat difficult to get the effort started with the necessary force, and by the light of another campfire the issues were submitted to the boys. This is what happened: First they voted to get back of, and get under the work; then they gave their group yell. A day or two later they attended the community theater and between acts yelled for the "Book Boost." The next day they went from house to house and solicited subscriptions, continuing the work until the drive had passed its goal.

We live in a timber country. The Bureau of Forestry sent out a lecturer on fire prevention and conservation of our trees. I reminded the boys that this was a chance to do some practical Scouting by assisting this campaign. When the eventful night came the roads were stiff with cold mud and the air was full of dark mist. Yet in spite of this the house was full, to the surprise of everyone but the Scouts. They had worked for such a result and gave the lecturer the finest audience he had enjoyed on his entire trip up our way. Later, in recognition of what the boys had done the Bureau of Forestry sent to the Scoutmaster a hundred buttons advocating tree protection. The Scouts were made the dispensers of the buttons and pledged every wearer to do his best to protect our forests. In this instance the boys directly linked hands with Uncle Sam.

The neighborhood cemetery had been woefully neglected. On Decoration Day school was dismissed and the public was expected to be on hand and help straighten up the little graveyard. The majority of the Scouts were there, but only a few others; and these others, almost without exception, busied themselves looking after their own lots. Our Batch of Boys throughout the day dug in the dirt and put "No Man's Land" into presentable appearance. This was done unostentatiously, and with little chance for praise.

The County Fair presented a challenge. The management wanted to furnish free-for-all street attractions which all the people could enjoy. Who would and who could look after this, and run the street sports efficiently and honorably? I asked the Scouts whether they would accept the job, and on that big day our Batch of Boys directed and entertained the masses for an afternoon. Above the hundreds of people waved two flags. The one was our Old Glory; the other was our troop banner bearing the words "Boy Scouts of America—Troop I—Parkdale, Oregon." Our Batch of Boys handled the county's crowd.

PERHAPS someone will want to ask how it is possible to get boys to attend to business as has been pictured. I have no cut-and-dried program. I just use them as personalities and not as human animals that are "only kids." We are partners: I value the friendship and respect of these boys as much as I do the good-will of "successful business men" and "influential citizens." I treat these boys as my fellow-men. We are comrades as well as partners. We enjoy motor rides together; we ramble the woods; we take hikes and spend evenings around a camp fire.

To show public respect to the lads we gave a church service in their honor. Likewise, we took all the boys as guests of honor the night the local picture theater showed a Boy Scout film. We put pep into our play and vim into our work. Whether on or off duty I strive to have the boys appreciate that the only Scout is a manly man: that he has character; that he is willing to do service without being paid for it. I hold practical heroism before the ambitions of the lads.

Without apology the writer asks whether conscientious work with boys is not the most practical, patriotic and constructive Christian service? Mere flag-waving, or allegiance-shouting, is a child's game in comparison with the directing of boys into manly ways of doing. Work like ours directly goes to the heart of the ever-vexing boy problem; indirectly we alleviate also the girl problem. Our work will hold its own with anything that is worth while. It is not our name, or any particular method; it is consecrated energy, time, brain and soul that does the business.

My limited success is made possible with my limited capacity, plus the will to do. I am superbly busy; I have a parish of all creeds and colors, as our community church ministers to all the people for miles up and down our valley. I used to be a boy hater and was afraid to mingle with the boisterous youths and robust lads. Physically I am not entirely well. These things testify to the fact that any normal man who wills to do so can achieve results with and for boys. I doubt whether there is any work under heaven that pays greater dividends to Christ and Country than getting hold of "A Batch of Boys." As Christian citizens I challenge men everywhere to get busy with boys' work.

What the Church Census Shows

OUR readers will welcome the publication of the annual census of the American Churches, which appears in this issue. Dr. H. K. Carroll, the eminent church statistician, who has compiled the first complete official Census of Churches for the government, and who has done this important work for many years for the Christian Herald, with announces the present census by far the most remarkable that has issued from his hands since the beginning of the World War. Its revelation of the growth that the churches have made phenomenal gains, whereby wiping out the heavy denominational losses early 1919, is something that ought to give encouragement to God's people everywhere. All the religious obolies are shown in this latest census to be rapidly increasing from the heavy setback which they sustained through the disturbing influences of the war.

"Many cases the denominational losses have been not only overcome, but the tide is still rising and new strength and added members are still flowing in."

Everyone who is interested in the progress of Christianity, not only here in the homeland but throughout the world, should find cheer and encouragement in this latest evidence of God's goodness to His Church.

There is nothing speculative in the statements in this remarkable document; they are based throughout on the official records of the denominational bodies themselves. The aggregate increase of 1919—the sum total of which for all the churches only reached 43,837—has given place to an advance totaling 667,007. One denominational group, the Methodist, which lost nearly 80,000 members in 1919, reports a gain for 1920 of over 237,000. Another group, the Presbyterian, has recovered from its loss of 46,457 and records an advance by 43,031 gain. Still another group, the Baptist, which in 1919 showed a net loss of over 11,000, now has a net gain of over 129,000. To speak in plain terms, the rule among the churches last year was that of general decrease; this year, it has become the rule of large and inspiring growth everywhere.

Our churches are on the Hills of Progress once again. Let us thank God for the blessing and take courage!

The City Pull

THE Farmer came to the Big City, and pausing on a busy corner he took account of the surroundings.

Streets jammed with rushing automobiles, hurrying both ways; sidewalks so thronged with people that he was several times pushed off into the street; noises of elevated and surface cars and whistles of police, and general din so loud that the farmer thought at first a general fire alarm had been turned in; unpleasant smells wafted up the streets from tenement and congested housing districts; skyscrapers so high that the sun failed to penetrate the canyons except at high noon; and anxious-faced men and women on every side.

He thought of his own wonderfully beautiful quarter section of God's earth, upland, meadow, woodland, God's light pouring down over it, sweet odors from wild flowers, long-drawn breaths from clear air spaces unsoiled by the soot and grime that fell on him as he stood on this Big City corner, and contrasted it all with God's acres where the noises were the songs of birds and the voices of nature, for the Farmer was one of a number who loved farming, and the earth, and the quiet, but his children had moved into the Big City, and he had his wife were getting old, and he could not carry on the farm work alone, and that was the reason he had come to the Big City where, he said, people were plenty, and work was scarce. And as he said to himself after standing on the corner a little while, "there will not be any trouble about getting some of these people to move out of this din and hurry and evil smells and crowding, into God's acres."

So the Farmer went up to a large group of husky looking men and said, "Any one of you want work?"

"Sure!" they all said at once, "we are looking for jobs."

"Then I'm just the man for you. I have fine work for two strong and able men."

And the whole group turned and said "What's the job?"

"Work on God's acres, the most beautiful job on earth, raising wholesome and necessary food for the people in the Big City."

"What!" they all said, "work on a farm! Not on a life, old clohopper! Back to your farm!"

"You can pay $80 a month, a good house for yourself and family, the use of a good garden, free board, the room, and its own."

"Hurry!"

"Hurry!"

"Hurry!"

use of an auto once or twice a week, and God's clean air in His out-of-doors!"

"Not for us," said the entire group of "unemployed men. "We prefer the Big City."

"But you are out of a job?"

"We are walking the streets for one."

"And you won't work on my farm?"

"We'll starve here first."

And the farmer went back to his farm and sold it cheap to an ignorant tenant, and came to live himself in the Big City. And the Moral of it all, is still to come.

Cleaning Up the Films

IN RESPONSE to the widespread public demand for reform in the movies, a new crusade has been started in an unexpected quarter, which promises to accomplish good results. Jesse L. Lasky, the head of one of the leading producing organizations, has issued a list of propositions for the government of his own corporation, and if his suggestions be followed by others, we are justified in anticipating that clean movies will shortly become the rule, rather than the exception. Recognizing the need of a thorough clean-up in the film business, this is what Mr. Lasky proposes as a basis of reform, and what he means to carry out in his own corporation:

No picture showing sex attraction in an improper manner;
"White-slave" pictures barred;
Pictures showing immorality in dress barred;
Inciting dances barred;
Needlessly impassioned love scenes barred;
Films showing life in the "underworld" barred;
Pictures showing gambling and drunkenness barred;
All pictures which might invite the morally weak to crime barred;
Films offensive to any religious sect or disrespectful to religion barred;
Suggestive comedy barred;
Scenes showing unnecessary bloodshed barred.

This is a good beginning. If Mr. Lasky's pledge be faithfully kept, his example should influence all engaged in the business. Bad pictures must go and the sooner the clean-up is begun in good earnest, the better.

Volunteer Goodness

TWO men were standing on the bank of a river when a third man ran up to them shouting, "A child drowning out there! I can't swim. If either of you can, jump in and save him!"

The first of the two men said to the other, "I can swim. Can you?"

"Yes, I took the first prize at college for the best swimmer!"

"Good!" said the man who had brought the news of the drowning. "Hurry! You can save him, if you hurry!"

All three ran to the spot. Sure enough a child was going down out in mid-stream. Its cry came to the men on the bank as its head disappeared.

"Hurry!" cried the man who had brought the news to the two swimmers. "You can save him if you hurry!"

"Wait a minute," said the first swimmer. "Let us organize a swimming committee and do the thing properly. I move that we form a Swimming Committee to save the child."

"Agreed," said the other swimmer. "I will appoint you as Chairman and I will be the Secretary and Treasurer." And the two men sat down on the bank and began to write down the articles of a constitution for a swimming association.

"But the child will drown!" cried the third man. "See! He is coming up for the last time! Hurry. Jump in and save him!"

"All in due time" said the two men. "We must organize this thing properly. We need to appoint more committees, and hire an office and train other swimmers."

To the Christian Herald:

My year expires next May, but I enclose $2.00 for another year ahead. The Christian Herald is simply magnificent. I intend to take it as long as I live. The good you are doing in the world cannot be weighed in human balances. I wish you all success and prosperity in every line of your work.

Signed (Mrs.) MARY S. SNYDER,
LaJolla, Calif.

"Meanwhile the child is drowning!" said the first man.

"That may be," said the two swimmers. "But we must organize in order to get others interested. We are not very much interested yet ourselves. But after we have created enthusiasm over this drowning child and got a lot of publicity about him there will probably be enough interest in the matter to save him, or at least some other child who may fall in at the same spot."

"But it is too late to save him now!" said the third man. "He has gone under for the last time!"

"Yes, he seems to have disappeared," said the two swimmers with some concern. "But we have got organized. If you see any more children drowning let us know."

One would think that all that would be necessary to get people of means (especially those who are "swimming" in wealth) to give to the saving of starving children would be to simply state the fact and point out the children going down.

But as a very prominent woman in one of our great cities said to the editor, "The only way you can get these people of society and wealth in this town to give to a great human need is first to amuse them." And the entertainment must be something very unusual and 'fetching.' And large sums of money must be spent on special appeals to entice people generally to give to suffering humanity."

The more's the pity. It is too true. Why is there not more voluntary goodness? The kind that does not have to wait to be organized and amused before it will save a drowning child?

A child is drowning! Yes, we see it, but people who can swim will not save it until they organize. Or until they are amused. Meanwhile the child is gone.

To Check Immigration

ONE of the questions which is taxing the wisdom of our national legislators at the present time is the restriction of immigration. Recognizing the need of restrictive legislation as a real one, the question at issue is as to the method under which such regulation ought to be applied. It is not enough to urge that because the influx of humanity from other lands has hitherto been practically unrestrained, it should continue to be so.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find that the first bill on the subject, originating in the House of Representatives, provided for a complete shut-down, barring all immigration for fourteen months. When the Senate took up the question, its first step favored the fixing of the yearly standard of immigration at 5 per cent. of the foreign-born of any other nationality now resident in this country, as shown under the census of 1910, as the maximum to be admitted in any one year. After considerable discussion, however, this was changed materially, and the Dillingham measure, which fixes the maximum annual immigration for the next three years on a 3 per cent. basis, applying the same principle, was passed by an overwhelming vote.

Under this bill, should it ultimately become a law, the immigration during the three years of the experiment, would be 355,461 a year. The passage of this bill was a compromise between the committee's proposition for a 5 per cent. average and shutting down immigration altogether for fourteen months. In effect, the new bill, should it pass the House and escape a veto, will fix the highest immigration on the list—that from Great Britain and Ireland—at a maximum of approximately 77,000 annually for the three years, and the lowest, that of Siberia, at 139 yearly maximum for the same period.

There is no selective feature in the Senate bill, such as has appeared in earlier legislation, dealing with the desirability or adaptability, and the physical and financial condition of those seeking admission. It is a simple limitation of numbers for the purpose of checking a flood which, in view of existing conditions in Europe, and keeping in mind the industrial and economic problems in our own land, might easily result in an undesirable and difficult situation. Russia, Austria, and possibly Poland have been ready for a huge emigration at the earliest opportunity, and the same remark might apply to several other countries. Only a foolish optimist would say that such a condition should be invited at this time. Three years is none too long to wait before the gates will again be thrown wide open. By that time Europe may have settled down to something approaching tranquillity, and conditions here may also be more favorable. But to welcome the unrestricted influx at the present time, would be both unwise and ill-judged.

The World News of the Week

Mr. Harding Reveals His Selections for Cabinet Posts

THE disclosure of Mr. Harding's selections for his cabinet evoked surprise in the case of only one portfolio and in the main the men he has chosen were those mentioned most frequently as probable members of his official family. As this is written a few days before the inauguration, at a time when some of the men whom he has invited to enter the cabinet have not announced their decisions, there may be last-minute changes in personnel, but those closest to the new President expect his slate to stand. It is as follows:

Secretary of State—Charles Evans Hughes, of New York, former governor, former Justice of the Supreme Court, and in 1916 the Republican nominee for the Presidency.

Secretary of the Treasury—Andrew Mellon, of Pennsylvania, banker and financier.

Secretary of War—John W. Weeks, of Massachusetts, former senator.

Attorney-General—Harry M. Daugherty, of Ohio, who managed Mr. Harding's pre-convention campaign.

Postmaster-General—Will H. Hays, of Indiana, chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Secretary of the Navy—Edwin Denby, of Michigan, a lawyer and former member of Congress, who enlisted as a private in the Marine Corps in 1917 and rose to the rank of major. His name had not been mentioned previously in cabinet gossip.

Secretary of the Interior—Albert B. Fall, of New Mexico, senator.

Secretary of Agriculture—Henry Wallace, of Iowa, editor of farm publications.

Secretary of Commerce—Herbert Hoover, of California, former Food Administrator.

Secretary of Labor—James J. Davis, of Pennsylvania and Illinois, head of the Moose fraternity, and formerly a union steel worker.

Mr. Hoover at first was in doubt about entering the cabinet, but decided to accept. Formal announcement that Mr. Hughes and Mr. Daugherty would sit in the cabinet had been made before the rest of the slate was revealed.

The cabinet selections were received favorably by most of the newspapers of the country and it was the consensus that it averaged up well. The choice of Mr. Hughes was greeted as a guarantee that the conduct of foreign affairs would be in strong hands, and the inclusion of Mr. Hoover added prestige to the list, despite the opposition of politicians to him. Perhaps the greatest criticism was over the appointment of Mr. Daugherty, whose legal abilities were the subject of attack and whose campaign activities led naturally to the charge that his selection was the payment of a political debt. There also was some opposition to Mr. Mellon, who will have large responsibilities in connection with the enforcement of national prohibition, because it was alleged he had had considerable investments in liquor properties. The general disposition was to expect satisfactory results from the cabinet and, in the words of the New York Times, to say "it looks like a good working body."

Mr. Harding's Cabinet Selections

cost $1,000,000 and which will appeal to public opinion to support labor in its dealings with the incoming administration. Such a bureau is an innovation for organized labor.

The conference also adopted a bill of rights, a 5,000-word document setting forth the policies for which organized labor will stand and the legislation which it will seek. Among its demands were recognition of the right of the working people to organize into trade unions, the right of collective bargaining, the right to work or to cease work collectively, and the right to collectively to bestow or withhold patronage; the prohibition of immigration for not less than two years; the repeal by the states of "all industrial court laws and all restrictive and coercive laws"; and the cessation of the use of the injunction in industrial disputes where they would not apply in the absence of such disputes.

The railroad executives have declared that wage reductions must be made in order to save the companies from bankruptcy, and other employers have demanded that the workers should accept wage cuts as their share in the readjustment from the period of inflation which came with the war. The conference flatly opposed such contentions. "Labor not only insists upon maintaining the present standards of wages and working conditions," its bill of rights asserted, "but declares its solemn purpose to continue its struggle to further improve these standards."

Mail Crosses United States in Thirty-Three Hours

ALL records for the rapid transportation of mail across the continent were broken when six bags of mail were landed by airplane in New York thirty-three hours and twenty minutes after they had left San Francisco. The best previous time for mail from the Atlantic to the Pacific was seventy-two hours, made by a combination of airplane and fast mail train, as against four days and a half for an all-rail trip.

The flying distance, according to official figures, was 2,666 miles, and was covered in an actual flying time of twenty-five hours and fifty-three minutes, an average rate of about 103 miles an hour.

Four airplanes left New York and San Francisco simultaneously in the try for a new record. Both of the west-bound machines were held up at Chicago by bad weather and the flight of one of the east-bound airplanes ended at Elko, Nev., when the pilot was killed by the crashing of his machine in a tail spin. The other machine braved the snow storms which had held up the westward flight and covered the 839 miles from Cheyenne, Wyo., to Chicago by night, a feat which was hailed as demonstrating the entire feasibility of commercial night-flying, since three landings for refueling and exchange of mail were accomplished without mishap.

As a result of the flight orders have been issued by the Postoffice Department for the establishment of regular night landing fields and an attempt will be made to cover the distance across the continent regularly on a thirty-six hour schedule.

Colby Sends Mandate Protest

SECRETARY of State Colby has sent to the Council of the League of Nations, meeting in Paris, a protest against the inclusion among the territories submitted to the Japanese mandate of the island of Yap, that tiny spot on the Southern Pacific of whose existence the public knew nothing until its importance as a link in the cable systems was debated. The American note declared this government never had consented to the transfer of the island to Japan and could not consider itself bound by the mandate, adding a request that the Council should submit the question to a new examination. The terms of the Japanese mandate were approved finally in December.

The Colby note, however, was much broader than a mere protest regarding Yap. It was a declaration that the American government claims an equal concern and interest with other nations in the disposition of Germany's overseas possessions. Along this line, it read: "As one of the principal Allied and Associated Powers, the United States has equal concern and inseparable interest with the other principal Allied and Associated Powers in the overseas possessions of Germany, and consequently an equal voice in their

The 100 national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, at a special conference in Washington, prepared definite plans to combat the "open-shop movement" which they assert certain groups of employers are fostering to disrupt trade unionism. It was the first such conference since early in America's participation in the World War and, like that session, was dominated by Samuel Compers, president of the Federation. One of the chief weapons in the fight will be a great publicity bureau, the organization and operation of which may

The Prayer That Prevails

TEXT—Mark 11:24. "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them."

A MAN who can pray is a Christian. But praying is something more than saying one's prayers. The Lord said to Ananias of Damascus, "Arise and go into the street called Straight and inquire for one Saul of Tarsus, for behold, he prayeth." Now in point of fact Saul of Tarsus had been saying prayers ever since he was born; prayers at the family altar, prayers in the town Synagogue, prayers of stately ceremony in the Temple; but he never really prayed until he discovered, at his conversion, that the name of Jesus was the countersign of prayer; as he himself had said, "I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

As prayer is the sign-manual of a Christian, so faith is the infallible test of prayer. A clear distinction, however, must be made between faith and credulity. We are not asked to believe anything which is not demonstrably so. "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen"; in other words, it is accepting spiritual truth as substantiated by evidence, only the evidence—inasmuch as it applies to immaterial things—is not and obviously can not be addressed to the physical senses. The address of faith is made directly to our spiritual nature, namely to mind, conscience, heart and will; the whole inward man being thus enlisted in the act of prayer, which is our upward gaze toward God.

And then the crucial test of faith is expectancy. This is our place of emphasis today. So far we have taken three steps: first, no one is a true Christian who does not pray; second, no prayer is true prayer which is not offered in faith; third, no faith is true faith which does not expect to get what it asks for.

THIS is briefly set forth in the words of Jesus: "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." The best exposition of this passage is found in the wonder-working ministry of Jesus Himself; as, for example, where He said to the father of the demoniac boy, "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth" (Mark 9:23), and to Mary and Martha at their brother's grave, "Said I not that if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God?" (John 11:40), and to Peter after his vain attempt to walk on the water, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" (Matt. 14:31), and to the blind men of Jericho, "According to your faith be it unto you" (Matt. 9:29).

It is obvious that what is intended here is something more than a mere belief that God is able to do thus and so. The blessing is promised to those who believe that God not only can but will do the thing that He is asked to do, and the answer to their prayer is measured out to them according to the expectancy of their faith.

Observe first, the proposition thus laid down is consistent with reason or plain common sense. The falsest proverb that ever was coined is this, "Blessed are those who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed." Live that way and you will die threadbare. Confidence begets confidence in every province of life. A whining beggar goes away empty-handed. "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him."

If you propose to go to a certain city, having bought your ticket, you take your seat and expect to arrive. In even so trifling an affair as that there is no appreciable element of doubt or uncertainty. You are not content with knowing that the engineer is able to carry you to that city; you are comfortably sure that he will do it. Is it too much for the Lord to ask of us a like confidence in Him?

THE second ground on which our proposition rests is Revelation. The Bible is full of promises addressed to those who pray with confidence; and every one of those promises is yea and amen. Listen to this: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Mark the fulness and unreservedness of that promise; it contains not an if, nor a perhaps, nor a peradventure, but three great shalls! And as if this were not enough—as if the Lord anticipated that somebody would intimate that He scarcely meant His words to be taken literally—He straightway added, "For every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened."

Or listen to this: "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you" (John 15:7). Let us be careful how we put limitations on promises which the Lord has not fenced in. "What ye will—all things—anything—everything whatsoever"; these are large words and more than a mouthful for most of us. But suppose the Lord meant them? What a draft on the exchequer of God!

Or take the promise in our text. It was given just after the withering of the barren fig-tree. When the disciples "marveled" at what had been wrought by a simple word of the Master, He said: "If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig-tree; but also if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done." Do you regard that as hyperbole; that is, "over-shooting" for effect? There's the trouble; we are naturally disinclined to believe that the Lord means exactly what he says. Of course, it was the way of it. According to your expectation [be it unto you]!

THE third of the foundation stones of our proposition is Observation. Lift up your eyes and see. The world is full of people who are prepared to certify, not only that God has answered their prayers, but that he has answered up to the full measure of their expectation.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"O Day of Rest and Gladness," or "From Every Stormy Wind that Blows!"

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all-join.

Scripture Reading—Acts 9:32-42.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(See page 205, first column.)

Sermon—"THE PRAYER THAT PREVAILS"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear," or "Come, Thou Almighty King."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read loud:

May there be no dismissal from Thy presence, O Gracious One, because we depart from one another, but may Thy benediction mean to us not a farewell until we meet again, but a daily companionship with Thee, from whom we pray we may never depart. In Jesus' name, AMEN.

Are you saying, "Now that is simply preposterous?" In the year 1836, a man named George Muller was greatly concerned for the neglected children of Bristol, England. He resolved to start an orphanage but, being without funds, the question was how to support it. He said: "I will undertake this thing for the Lord and expect Him to stand behind it." Great expectations! "A Utopian dream!" Have it your own way, my friend; but the facts are against you. That was eighty-five years ago; the Bristol Orphanage is still in evidence; and meanwhile not a cent has been asked of any soul this side of heaven to support it.

The institution grew from a small beginning until five orphan-houses were filled with children. It grew without "drives" or appeals. And for almost a century, thousands of children have been dependent for their daily bread on the prayers of one man who had faith enough to undertake a great thing for God and to expect great things from Him. Here is a miracle more inscrutable from the world's point of view than the feeding of a lone prophet by ravens in a cleft of the hills. A miracle? Certainly. Why not? Every answer to prayer is a miracle. God as the great wonder-worker is handing out miracles to expectant people every moment of every hour of the day.

BUT there is a fourth ground for our proposition, to wit, Experience. The way to discover whether the Lord is good or not is to "taste and see."

David had his ups and downs like everybody else; and he tells what happened to him once as he was going through the Vale of Baca: "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard and saved him out of all his trouble"; and in another place he explained by saying that his "expectation was from God."

Peter was a man of faith; but even his faith had its fainting spells. One morning he and other fishermen had come ashore after a night spent in taking nothing but water hauls, when Jesus came by. "Launch out into the deep," He said, "and let down your nets for a draught." Peter answered, "Master, we have toiled all night and taken nothing; nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net." Then came the great draught of fishes. It always comes to those who take the Master at His word. His promises can be depended on. "Not one faileth!" The point of weakness is not in the unwillingness of the Lord to grant our petitions to the very uttermost, but in the fact that at our best we do not half believe in Him.

Faith has value only as it unites us with God. It is like the coupler that unites the locomotive with a train of cars; there is no power in the coupler, nevertheless the train would be at a standstill without it. God is omnipotent; and when faith brings us into vital contact with Him, the power of the great Dynamo works through us. It thus appears that Paul was not exaggerating but stating a simple and reasonable truth when he said, "I can do all things through Him that strengtheneth me!"

There are two immeasurable facts that overtop others along the horizons of human life. One of them is the love of God, as manifest in Christ; of which Paul says in his Epistle to the Ephesians: "I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that He would grant you, according to the riches of His glory, to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."

THE other of the immeasurable things is Faith, which links up the finite with the infinite and fills a man potentially with "all the fulness of God."

"Open thy mouth wide," saith the Lord, "and I will fill it!" I wonder if the Psalmist, when he was writing that, had in mind the days when, as a shepherd boy, he had watched the fledglings in an eagle's nest opening their bills for what the mother-bird was bringing them? Did that suggest to him the eager cry of those whose expectation is in God?

The widow of a minister, long, long ago, came to the prophet's house and wept out her sorrow, saying, "My creditors have come, and they require my two sons as a pledge, and these are all that are left to me." The prophet said, "What hast thou?"—"Nothing."—"Nothing?"—"Only a pot of oil; nothing else is left."—"Go back to thy house and borrow vessels. Borrow of thy neighbors, and borrow not a few; then enter into a room with thy lads, and shut to the door and pour out." She did so; the first vessel was filled and the supply was not gone. "Bring me another," said she to the lads; and they brought her another. It was filled and the oil was not stayed. Another and another, vessels not a few; all vessels they had provided. "Bring me yet another." And the lads said, "There is not another here." Then the oil was stayed. O beloved, God's resources are infinite! The oil flows on forever; but the vessels give out. Let us pray for faith; for the faith that expects great things, for the faith that takes God at His word: "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you!"

HOW many churchless homes does your community contain? Where are they located? How many times have they been visited by pastors during the past year? Do the children of such households attend Sunday school? Has any real effort been made to enlist these families in the church? With what results?

These are important questions to any church. Can you answer them accurately and completely with reference to your community? The Ohio Federation of Churches is urging house-to-house surveys to answer these and similar questions as a prerequisite to any community program of evangelism. Such a survey is the only means of collecting the information essential to the most successful evangelism. There are three obvious methods of collecting the information: It may be done by an employed worker, by the pastors of the community, or by teams of laymen. It is not proposed to drop the old methods, but to add new ones, planned in a systematic manner to carry the Gospel to the last home in every community in the manner best calculated to appeal to the people of that home.

The Joy of the Lord

SUNDAY. Matt. 25 : 21. "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. Whose joy? 'The joy of thy Lord.' But I thought He was 'a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.' I thought His face was 'marred more than any man's,' worn and furrowed by pain. 'Surely He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows.' And yet here is the word, 'Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' He was the Lamb of Calvary, and yet within twenty-four hours of the crucifixion, with His face steadfastly set toward death, and His feet already treading the grim and darkening way, He spoke of 'My joy.' 'These things have I spoken unto you, that My joy may be in you.' A Man of sorrows—'My joy.' Are they contradictory? Nay, they are supplementary. Each interprets the other. The sorrow explains the joy. Unless we share in the sorrow, we cannot partake of the joy.

What is the joy of our Lord? In one of His most beautiful parables, the Lord gives us a glimpse of one of His joys. A shepherd has lost a sheep. It has wandered on to the wilds, and has missed the flock. The good shepherd goes in search of it. He trudges high and low, far and wide, gazing with strained vision, and at last he finds his sheep. "And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulder, rejoicing." That is one of the joys of the Lord—the finding of the lost! "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Can we do it? Stay a moment. Let us follow the shepherd home. "And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost." Could they really enter into his joy?

Suppose that among his neighbors there were some who had been with him upon the wilds, who had dared the dangers of the heights and the terrors of the beasts, who had trudged with tired feet far into the chilly night—would not these be just the neighbors who would be able to enter into the shepherd's joy? To enter into the joy of finding, we must have entered into the pain of seeking.

To enter into the joy of my Lord, I, too, must become "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

Fitting the Blessing

MONDAY. Phil. 4 : 19. "And my God shall supply ALL your need." There are few brighter promises than this, and at the same time few concerning which there is so much fear and doubt. We think it is a splendid saying, and time and again we ask God to fit a blessing to us, as the case may need, then speedily set to work to "unfit" ourselves for the very thing we have been asking for.

To illustrate: Here is a man who goes to his tailor for a suit of clothes. The tailor makes the most careful measurements, and then commences the conjuring with the cloth. In a day or two you go in to be "fitted," and he may find it necessary to make alterations here and there, until finally you are a sample of "spick and spanness." In a word, you have had the suit fitted to you.

Now, God stands ready to fit blessings to you and me, but often he finds it necessary to make alterations. And these alterations must be made in us, not in the blessing we are asking. In other words, God may have to fit us to the blessing, rather than the blessing to us!

Instead of praying that He may suit a blessing to your needs, let the prayer of your heart be "My Father, make me fit to receive from Thee the blessings Thy loving heart longs to bestow."

Alone with Jesus

TUESDAY. John 20 : 19. "When the doors were shut—Jesus came." When the disciples locked the doors to prevent interruption, Christ knew that He was sure of a welcome. He had been waiting for this opportunity to manifest Himself unto them. He could not speak to His friends in the presence of His enemies. He could not get their ear on account of the din and confusion that came through the open doors. Have you ever tried to carry on a conversation over the telephone in a room full of uproar? Then you know why "Jesus came, when the doors were shut."

Closing the door to the world is opening the door to the Master. He is always passing by those doors that are wide-open to all the frivolity and vanity of men; but whenever He finds the door shut to these things, He seeks admittance. He knows that there is room for Him on the other side of the closed door.

Do not be afraid of shutting the door; it is the best invitation for the Master to enter. "Enter into thy closet and shut the door," and He will see that His presence is desired. In the busy modern world, with its multiplicity of interests, we must find time to be alone with the Master. When the doors are shut, Jesus still comes!

Enjoying Religion

WEDNESDAY. Psa. 119 : 77. "Thy law is my delight." God meant that His religion should be enjoyed, not endured. More and more I am convinced that we are not getting out of religion all that God put into it for us. I meet people who "catch" religion just as they would a disease, and they take it "awful hard." They seem to think it is all fear and solemnity. They are never sure that it is right for them to enjoy themselves. In my mind, God intended that we should enjoy His religion, and the people with whom we live should enjoy it also. The presence of Christ should put a new song in the heart and a new smile upon the face.

We need to realize more and more the presence of God in our lives. We forget to count God in. Too often in looking at things, we forget to look at God.

We need to realize, more than we do, the power of prayer. Too often we neglect this means and then wonder why we are so weak. Pray when you need to pray, not when you feel you have to. Do not make a performance, but use it as a privilege.

We need to be more faithful in our Bible study and church attendance. These things make for strength and usefulness in the Christian life. Let us keep busy in the Lord's work and there will be little time to doubt the Lord's word.

Growing in Grace

THURSDAY. II Peter 3 : 18. "But grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The logic of God is growth and development making for an intelligent progress and worthy civilization. In agriculture we are working from the seed to the harvest, and from the harvest to bread with which to meet the world's hunger. In literature we are working from the alphabet up into the world's best production in prose and poetry.

Religion begins with the child-lisp: "Now I lay me down to sleep," and rises up to the man's petition, "Thy Kingdom Come," followed by the "Amen" of service and ministry. The mile-stones of Christian progress are Good, Better, Best. The Christian life in men and institutions is one big forward movement.

"As the Christian grows old, he should grow in grace. The nearer he gets to his 'four-score years and ten' the nearer he should be to God. He should be better today than he was yesterday, better tomorrow than today. Paul said, 'When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things.' His was the philosophy that could sing 'Grow old along with me, the best is yet to be.' The Christian who follows Jesus Christ is leaving the night behind and making his way toward the light of the Eternal Day."

The Soul's Need of Wisdom

FRIDAY. James 1 : 5. "If any of you lack wisdom." Our mental equipment is made up of two things, Knowledge and Wisdom. By knowledge is meant, in general terms, all that we acquire through the five physical senses; by wisdom all that lies beyond the province of the physical senses and within the purview of faith.

Faith is a sixth sense which is given to man exclusively for the apprehension of spiritual things. Knowledge is important but "wisdom is the principal thing," because it has to do with the great problems which take hold of eternal life.

One may get along without penetrating the secrets of nature; but to know about God and the Atonement and Immortality and Character and Usefulness, this is a matter of vital moment. Wherefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding as to the great questions which center in God.

Prayer a Cure for Discouragement

SATURDAY. Luke 18 : 1. "Men ought always to pray and not to faint." "To pray or to faint"—that is often the question. Alas, fainting seems easier than praying at times! We are more driven to surrender in despair than to our knees in prayer. It is hard work to pray, but it requires no effort to faint. Prayer is active; fainting is passive. And if they pray at all, it must be an act of will energized by faith.

Prayer is rowing against the current and setting one's face up-stream; it is refusing to drift with the easy-flowing waters. To faint is to be discouraged; but to pray is to muster courage.

The easiest thing in the world is to lose heart, and the hardest thing in the world is getting one's self together in genuine prayer. "No man ever became a saint in his sleep." By dint of perseverance in prayer, when every natural instinct is crying out for soft surrender, the higher life is always achieved.

The thing we ought to do is seldom that which we find it easiest to do, and prayer is no exception. Prayer is the difficult art of refusing to faint, and it is the only alternative. Learn how to pray, and you need never lose heart.

The Greatest Prophecy—A Meditation for Lent

II Peter 1 : 19. "We have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto we do well that we take heed, as unto the light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn."

THE prophecy to which allusion is made is that of a Great Life. The surest prophecy concerning life everlasting is the earthly life of Jesus the Christ. In Him life and immortality were brought to light. According to His own declaration it was for this very purpose He entered our sphere of being. Life eternal pulsed in every word He uttered, every deed He did. With extraordinary persistency He endeavored to focus the attention of all followers, believing and unbelieving alike, upon the future life latent within Him. "I am the resurrection; I am the life." But it was simply too good to believe. His chosen twelve even were not predisposed to accept the statement at face value. As Jews, they had been brought up to believe the resurrection to be something afar off, other-worldly, and not something of present realization.

True, they enjoyed flashes of intelligence, but they were fleeting—very. They recognized in Jesus the fulfillment of long-cherished hopes. Eagerly they discussed with Him prophecies dear to every heart, little realizing that the greatest of all prophecies stood beside them in living and tangible form—the prophecy of life everlasting.

Now, the transcendently glorious thing about this verse is its inference. Every life is a prophecy. The greatest life can not be more. The humblest life is nothing less. In this life we do not arrive—we start. Each exertion is a fresh revelation of latent capacities, every hope a foregleam of grander realization. We endeavor to do something and it turns out to be bigger than we had anticipated. We set out to reach some far-off horizon of longing or ambition, to find we have only pushed life's horizon far beyond. From the cradle to the grave we are ever on our way, but we never arrive.

Then we enter the dark valley and find, with surprise and rapture, that as the physical faculties slip from our shoulder like a dusty and ragged garment, the perceptive powers, stronger than at any period of life, unmistakably discern the path of continuity leading up the sunlit slope beyond the vale. That this is actually so every physician, every bedside watcher knows perfectly well. A prophecy at the cradle, life is still a prophecy at the grave.

Is there Scripture warrant for such deductions, such assurance? Yes, of the strongest kind. It is none other than this prophetic aspect of mortal life that St. Paul sets forth so clearly in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians. Moreover, we are not without convincing circumstantial evidence. In these bodies of ours we have the broadest hints of "the body that shall be."

For example, an eminent biologist observes: "The human body has already passed through as great and marvelous, yet always connected, changes here as that final change at the resurrection. Judging from what we know of the present body, nothing is more probable than that our future bodies will be more personal and recognizable than ever in this present clouded and imperfect being."

"I am dying an unfulfilled prophecy," said John Ruskin. Such should be the sublime affirmation of every departing follower of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Preserving in Springtime

ONE is apt to think that it is only in summer that the preserve jar may be filled. But in March there are a number of fruits that may be put up and they are not always expensive. Only a little bit at a time may be made—just a glass or two, often—and the extra labor in connection with it will not be noticed. Dried fruits, oranges, lemons, winter apples, cranberries, raisins and nuts can be used in combinations for these winter-time dainties and, as it is not necessary to select the most perfect fruit for this purpose, these preserves do not need to be at all expensive.

Soak one pound of evaporated peaches for several hours, after they have been carefully washed. Then cook them very slowly until soft enough to break into pieces. Mash with a potato masher to a pulp, and add enough sugar to sweeten. Simmer slowly until thick and then pour into glasses. This recipe makes a peach butter that is a delicious spread for bread or crackers.

To make spiced prune marmalade, take one pound of prunes, one cupful of vinegar, one and one-half cupfuls of sugar, one-half teaspoonful each of cloves and cinnamon. Soak the prunes, and simmer for an hour in the same water. Drain and extract the pits, and cut the prunes into small pieces. Return to the fire with the liquid and add the vinegar, spices and sugar. Simmer till thick.

Apple-butter, with raisins, is another delicious spring preserve. It is easily and inexpensively made with six tart apples, one-quarter of a pound of nut meats, one-half pound of raisins, and one pound of brown sugar. Pare and slice the apples; wash and seed the raisins and chop them and the nut meats together, rather coarsely. Mix all the ingredients and place over the fire, with just enough water to keep them from burning. Cook slowly for three-quarters of an hour, then add the sugar and continue cooking until thick.

Old-Fashioned Buckwheat Cakes

SO MANY people use the "self-rising" flours now for hot cakes that the old-fashioned buckwheat cakes, such as our grandmothers used to make, are becoming almost unknown. But it is still possible to get plain buckwheat flour, and the cakes made from it and yeast raised taste quite different from any others.

You will need one-half of a compressed yeast cake dissolved in one-quarter of a cupful of warm water, one and one-half cupfuls of buckwheat flour, one-half cupful of white flour, one cupful of water, two tablespoonfuls of molasses, and one and a quarter teaspoonfuls of salt.

Mix these ingredients at night, stir well, cover and leave this in a warm place to rise. Before breakfast the sponge should be light and foamy. Stir and then add, one-half rounded tablespoonful of butter (melt after measuring) and one-half teaspoonful of soda dissolved in one tablespoonful of warm water. Beat well and pour from a pitcher or the tip of a spoon to get a well rounded cake. Bake on a hot griddle.

Breakfasts

THE normal healthy man, woman or child has a real relish for breakfast. If any member of the family is in perfect health and doesn't relish his breakfast, there is something the matter with the breakfast.

The coffee should be well made in a perfectly dry clean coffee-pot only a few minutes before it is served. Coffee that has stood half an hour is never so good. Cream for cereal and coffee in the morning are so expensive as to be beyond the reach of many families these days, but the top of the bottle of milk should be used for breakfast, unless the milk is being fed to young children or babies. They should have the full milk with none of it taken off the top. But for adults, and the ordinary household usage, the milk after the top has been removed is quite all right. If you boil the milk it will be richer than raw milk in coffee.

Try to have a little fruit for breakfast, even if it is only a little strained orange juice, or a stewed pear, or some stewed prunes. Just the taste of fruit is appetizing—large portions are not at all necessary.

The Question of Sugar

UNTIL the war came upon us sugar was a cheap food. But sugar even at eight to ten cents still is a cheap food compared with oil. And sugar is a very necessary food. In the American home the consumption of sugar should not be reduced in the kitchen or on the table. It should be reduced in its more expensive manufactured states—in candies and beverages. If we are going to cheapen the American diet without reducing its quality, we must do so by increasing the consumption of bread and of milk, and by decreasing the consumption of certain fruits and vegetables; by reducing the consumption of meats and meat products and by holding the consumption of sugar to the amount we are accustomed to, because it is a cheap food. But we must consume sugar more in the form of sugar and less in the form of confections of all kinds that bear a very high cost of preparation and marketing as related to the actual cost of the sugar itself.

Worth-While Recipes

APPLE DUMPLINGS

MAKE a foundation dough the same as for pie-crust and roll it to about one-fourth of an inch thick. Cut in squares large enough to envelop the apples—which should be tart and well flavored. The apples should be pared, cored, and filled with a mixture of butter, sugar and cinnamon, before they are wrapped in the blankets of dough. They are then steamed or baked, whichever is preferred. Steamed apple dumplings will require at least an hour's cooking. Forty-five minutes will be sufficient, if the dumplings are to be baked. Before putting them in the oven to bake sprinkle the dumplings with a little flour and sugar and pour a little boiling water in the pan in which they are to be cooked. This will prevent them from sticking.

CAPER SAUCE

Boiled mutton seems quite often to need caper sauce to give it a proper flavor. The sauce is easily made with two tablespoonfuls of butter, two tablespoonfuls of flour, one-quarter teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of onion juice, one cupful of boiling water, four tablespoonfuls of capers, and one tablespoonful of vinegar. Make a sauce of the first five ingredients, and just before removing from the fire, add the capers and vinegar.

MUTTON AND VEGETABLE SOUFFLE

A small piece of stewing mutton from the neck or shoulder should be cooked in enough water to cover it until tender. Add half an onion, stuck with two cloves, and a few celery tops. Let the meat cool in the water in which it has cooked, then chop it up fine. Add to a cupful and a half of the chopped meat one cupful of seasoned cream sauce and a small cupful of finely chopped cooked carrots, cooked celery, drained canned peas, and chopped parsley blended together. Heat to the boiling point and stir in the beaten yolks of two eggs, with salt and paprika to taste. Remove from the fire, cool and fold in the stiffly whipped whites of the eggs. Turn into a buttered dish and bake in a moderate oven until well risen and browned.

BANANA PUFFS

Take as many bananas as there are persons to serve. Roll in sugar and cinnamon. Then roll in a thin pie crust. Bake in a hot oven and serve with whipped cream or lemon sauce.

GLASGOW SOUP

This soup is made of the bone left from the roast leg of mutton with a little of the meat attached to it. Crack the bone in two places and put into a soup kettle with three pints of water, one teaspoonful and a half of barley, and a scant teaspoonful of salt. Simmer for one hour and add some chopped celery, diced turnips, carrots, and onions. Cook until the vegetables are very tender. Then remove the mutton bones, chop up the meat, and return it to the soup. Season with a little more salt and pepper if necessary and serve very hot.

BREADED MUTTON CHOPS

Shoulder chops are an inexpensive cut of meat, but it is difficult to make them palatable by frying or broiling. A very satisfactory dish can be made of them, however, if they are covered with a little mound of seasoned bread dressing or mashed potatoes and placed in a casserole. Add a little stock or water, season with salt, pepper, and a little onion or celery salt, and bake until the chops are tender. Add a little kitchen bouquet to the thickened gravy and serve in the casserole very hot.

HONEY POP-CORN BALLS

Take a cupful of strained honey, put it into a saucepan, boil until it comes from the spoon in large threads—not fine threads. Have ready one quart of freshly popped corn. Pour the honey over it, mixing all the while. When it is a little cool grease the hands and mould the corn into balls. Stand them on greased paper. A cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of water boiled to a syrup can be used instead of honey.

The Home Mail-Bag

TO the Home Editor:

I am sending you this recipe for Eggless Pumpkin pie, that has always been most satisfactory. Prepare the filling as usual, only a bit thicker with pumpkin than when eggs are used. In place of eggs use two level tablespoonfuls of flour or one heaping spoonful of corn starch, and a rounded teaspoonful of baking powder well mixed with the sugar. This prevents the pie from being soggy or heavy. Squash may be used instead of pumpkin.

TO the Home Editor:

When the moths were getting into my tapestry carpet I took it up and had it cleaned thoroughly. After scrubbing the floor I took a strong solution of alum and rubbed it into the boards, and into all the cracks and corners. When dry the floor was covered with alum crystals. I put the carpet down on top of them and rubbed some weak alum solution into the few patches where the moths had begun working. I did this years ago and there has been no sign of a moth since. I think this better than using benzine.

TO LAUNDER tatted lace always use a brush stroking with an outward stroke which keeps the picots straight.

Never rub or pour water through to rinse but lay the lace on a smooth surface and brush out carefully. Then picking out the picots when they dry will be unnecessary.

Raisins baked in rhubarb or custard pies give an unusual flavor that many people like.

When making blue-water add just a little common salt to it. This helps to distribute the color evenly, and prevents the clothes from looking streaked and patchy.

Put a pinch of powdered borax into the water in which you wash lettuce. Let the leaves soak for half an hour or so in this, then shake them free from water, wipe each one separately after well rinsing, and the lettuce will be unusually crisp.

Discarded catalogues, because of the texture of the paper, absorb grease readily and the leaves are effective for wiping the range, cleaning the outside of lanterns or oil cans. One placed on the ironing board, instead of an iron rest, does away with the noise, removes any smoke, that may have stuck to the iron, and gives warning if the iron is too hot.

To mend white china effectively paint the edges with common white paint, press together carefully, and wipe off the surplus paint. When thoroughly dried, which takes about a week, the dish may be used and washed as when new.

Longer life may be given to galvanized ware by painting the bottoms of the pails, tubs, etc., with common house paint before any holes appear in them.

White outing flannel makes good crib blankets. They should be made at least six inches longer than the crib. One width of the cloth is usually wide enough for the baby, but if a wider one is preferred the two widths should be joined at the selvages with over-stitches. Press the seams open with a warm iron. A binding of ribbon adds to their attractiveness.

Denial

By MABEL F. ARBUTHNOT

WITH frightened lips I shall not ever say,
"I know Him not," for none will question me.
I shall not need to speak a word today,
To publish to the world my loyalty.
And yet a hundred times there comes the voice,
"Know you this Man, the Master?" and behold,
A hundred times I make the fateful choice,
Today, as the apostle once of old.
And ev'ry unkind word or straying thought,
And ev'ry deed of hatred or disdain,
Say plainly to the world, "I know Him not."
And then the cock crows—bitter morn of pain!

And would indeed today that they might be—
The times I have denied Him—only three!

Jesus on the Cross

Matt. 27: 35-50

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

THE greatest March of Triumph in history was about three-quarters of a mile in length and extended from the place of judgment in the city of Jerusalem to the place of crucifixion outside the city wall. Crowds might jeer at Him who had been sentenced after an illegal trial and others would wag their heads at the Place of the Skull, but sacrificial work on that Great Day of Atonement was perfect and the Galilean had conquered. Scenes along the Via Dolorosa have been described. The soldier bore the sign declaring the accusation, the quaternion guard obeyed the orders of the centurion, Simon of Cyrene did his part, the women of Jerusalem wept, but no record has been written of the heavenly attendants who were present, even as when the angels sang at His birth.

Bible research is called for in studying this lesson even more than usual. The account in each Gospel should be read. A harmony of the Gospels will blend the writings into a chronological account of the events of this day, beginning with the scene in the Garden of Gethsemane in the early morning and concluding with rolling the stone before the garden tomb. If you do not have a harmony make your own by following the order of the events of the day.

A sixty-four-page booklet entitled, "His Last Week," is an interwoven record from Bethany to the Ascension and can be purchased for ten cents, or less in quantities. Make also a careful study, using the marginal references in your Bible, of the Old Testament prophecies which were fulfilled. The Seven Words from the Cross furnish material for special character study of Jesus Christ. A careful study of this lesson will greatly intensify the meaning of Friday, March 25, when the Christian world gives special thought to the crucifixion of the son of Mary Who is also the Son of God. He was crucified for us.

IN SPITE of the fact that the world is living Anno Domini (in the year of the Lord) 1921 there are many who can not see Him in the progress of the centuries and deny His divinity. Such personal opinions expressed in opposition to the evidences of time are foolish utterances in the face of the declaration of the centurion who was in charge of the work of crucifying the Messiah. He was a Roman and performed his cruel work as in the routine of his life. Doubtless he was either indifferent to or actually prejudiced against the prisoner. The One hanging on the central cross was no different to him than the two thieves who were on either side. In fact he could make no mistake concerning that central figure. He had but to read I.N.R.I. (Jesus Nazarenus Rex Judaeorum), the sign over that cross, and he would be in a position to utter his ridicule with the chief priests who left their temple work to scoff with the rabble.

The centurion was able to judge for himself: no curse had fallen from His lips upon the soldiers, kindly words had been spoken to the weeping women who were noted en route and who may have been the same women who gave the stupefying myrror wine which was so kindly refused. This Man had even prayed for His crucifiers. He had said something that had been of wonderful comfort to one of the malefactors, and then there had been three hours of darkness. "Who is He?" The answer is one of conviction by reason of the evidences of the day: "And when the centurion, who stood by over against Him, saw that he so gave up the ghost, he said, 'Truly this man was the Son of God.'" Mark 15:39. No disputant opinionist of today can outweigh the testimony of the centurion.

There is a story told about Barabbas that is universal in its application. The tale can be elaborated with much local color. Barabbas was in the castle of Antonio waiting the time of his crucifixion. The quaternion of soldiers come for him at last and after they reach the street of Jerusalem file away, but Barabbas halts. At last he understands that he is free because the custom has again been observed at the Passover season and he has been liberated while another, named Jesus, is to be crucified. This was the decision of the Jews when Pilate asked them to make a choice between the two. Walking aimlessly about the city Barabbas is attracted by the crowd passing along the Via Dolorosa and he follows them to Golgotha. He watches the proceedings and is attracted by the name "Jesus" over the central cross. He finally recalls that the centurion who told him of his release said that he was freed and a man by the name of Jesus was to be crucified. Then Barabbas comes up close to the foot of that central cross and looking upon the One hanging there in his awful suffering says: "I do not know what you did or why you are there. I only know that you are there in my place."

THE supreme work of Christ was His death rather than His perfect life. His wayside ministries, however, were performed to the very last, regardless of personal suffering or heart-burden. The thief on the cross soon learned the full meaning of "Today thou shalt be with me in paradise." No death can have the sacrificial value of that of Jesus Christ, but all can follow His example of soul-saving work, and countless opportunities are at hand. The thrill of the story of the personal work of the Korean Christians is still more intense when heard at first hand in Korea. The many imprisoned Christians were just so many prison evangelists. Our own sorrow is greatly lightened when we are actively concerned in the soul of another. Right now the Presbyterian Church in Korea is in the midst of a year of evangelism. Other denominations are equally active. Every three members meet together frequently, each to pray for some individual whom they are seeking, by the power of the Spirit, to win to Christ.

People still have petty interests in the face of great realities and supreme values. The soldiers divided some clothing and cast lots for the seamless garment, probably woven by Mary, as they waited before the cross when each might have been saved eternally, as was the one thief. Today the world is blowing too many bubbles and following human "isms" when God is knowable and has incalculable values to bestow.

Questionnaires are being sent out asking, What is the greatest need of the world today? Pilate wanted to know, What is truth? The world as ever needs to know Him aright, Who is the way, the truth and the life. The truths of the Cross must be first learned, then accepted and continuously applied both with reference to self and also proclaimed to others. The Supreme Sacrifice was not made on the Field of Flanders but at Calvary. The Master has left a commission to those who love Him because He died for them, and who may desire to serve with or even suffer for His sake. He declared, in Luke 9:23, "And he said unto ALL, If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his CROSS daily, and follow me."

The world-call of today is for sacrifice, and this does not necessarily mean suffering but it does mean service. The starving in China, Europe and the Near East make an insistent appeal, but beyond their cry for food is their need for the Saviour. There is not only the hunger for food and for the Gospel but also for you. In the homeland there are countless cross-bearing opportunities. Stand still and look upon the Christ of the Cross. If for me, then for Him, and we can count it all joy.

It's one of the finest homes in Manila—a home of distinction in a setting of tropical architecture which includes many examples of Mr. Odom's own construction work. The turning point in his life came when he learned how to make his natural ability profitable.

This is the home he dreamed about

A MAN can work and work and work; and never get anywhere at all. He can have his dreams of the home that is to be, only to have that home a little farther away, instead of a little nearer at the end of each year.

That is the greatest tragedy of business—the hard work men do that counts for so little; the years of their lives that are lost in routine, when they might so easily know the joy of succeeding while they are still young.

Debt and discouragement and then the turning point

W. J. ODOM is a builder and contractor in the Philippines. No one ever accused him of lack of industry. He worked as faithfully at his business as any one possibly could.

But he was merely exchanging dollars. Each year found him no better off than the year before; and in 1913 there came a reverse that left him thousands of dollars in debt.

Years of work and worse off than when he started!

What six years—and training—had done

IN that year, 1913, a representative of the Alexander Hamilton Institute visited Manila and Mr. Odom enrolled for the Modern Business Course and Service.

Last year, 1920, the representative of the Institute visited Manila again.

Mr. Odom owns one of the finest homes in Manila. His profits in a single year have been more than $75,000. Scores of the best buildings in the city are his creation.

And he attributes it all to one influence alone, the Alexander Hamilton Institute's training.

The training brought him the experience of the most successful business men of America; it was as if he had their counsel in person. The weak spots in his previous business activities stood out as if a great light had been thrown on them.

He did not need to work any harder than he had worked before. But from the day of his enrolment his work began to count. And in less than six years his dreams had come true.

Why waste another year in routine?

THE Institute has only one course. It is built on the solid truth that the fundamentals of business management are the same for all business—the same in New York and Manila, in Portland, Oregon, and Portland, Maine. The product of the Institute is not specialists, but men capable of directing specialists—executives, who know the underlying principles of each department of business.

To master those underlying principles in the "slow school" of practical experience takes years of most men's lives. It is the proud privilege of the Institute to help men save those wasted years.

"Forging Ahead in Business"

NOT every man can profit by the Institute's training. A man must have some vision—some idea of where he wants to be in the next few years; some dreams that he wants to make come true. For such men there is a world of inspiration in the 116-page book, "Forging Ahead in Business" which is published by the Institute. It answers all your questions about this training; and to men of serious purpose it is sent without obligation. Send for your copy today.

Vapo-Cresolene

Established 1879

The time for Vapo-Cresolene is at the first indication of a cold or sore throat, which are so often the warnings of dangerous complications.

It is simple to use, as you just light the little lamp that vaporizes the Cresolene and place it near the bed at night.

The soothing antiseptic vapor is breathed all night; making breathing easy, relieving the cough and easing the sore throat and congested chest.

Cresolene is recommended for Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Influenza, Bronchitis, Coughs, and Nasal Catarrh. Its germicidal qualities make it a reliable protection against these epidemics.

It gives great relief in Asthma.

Cresolene has been recommended and used for the past forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

With the Eyes of a Child

MY grand-mother's library—a great, sun-splashed room lined with row upon row of books—is a place that will always live in my memory.

I can close my eyes, today, and see again the dull heavy rugs, and the broad fireplace, and the faded, comfortable furniture. And I can see myself, a small girl with tight little pigtails and scratched knees, snuggled down into a great arm chair with a book in my two chubby hands.

I will never forget the joy that reading brought to me. I felt, when words first began to take on definite meanings, that I had made a new and wonderful discovery. I felt that world of precious facts, that a veritable treasure store, lay before me. And grand-mother's library was the personification of the treasure; was the garden in which the precious facts grew.

A great many books, had grand-mother. It seemed that she had every conceivable sort of a volume upon some shelf—as if no subject had been neglected. There were wide leather books, and narrow cloth bound books, and rare old books, and brand new books. There were books of sermons, and books of biography, and history books, and novels. And I dipped into each one of them—each one of them that I could reach, for some of the shelves were very high!—as an eager little bee dips into one flower after another.

I realize, now that I read many books that were far—infinitely far—beyond my young comprehension. I realize, now, that many of the stories that I read were scarcely juvenile. I realize it, now, but then I did not realize anything. I just read on, and on—passing lightly over those things that I did not understand.

Certain days, in that sun-splashed library, stand out in high relief against the blurred background of the past. There were certain moments when I leaned against grand-mother's satin clad shoulder; other times when we stared, together, into the fire and watched the leaping flames build pictures. And there was one time in particular when I crept in to borrow a book and found that grand-mother was serving tea to three white haired ladies of quite evident importance.

THEY were kind to me, the ladies, with the unveiled condescension that some grown-ups always display toward children. They patted my head, and told me that I was growing very fast, and that they hoped I would always be a good girl. Yes, they were very kind until grand-mother—who was never in the least condescending to children—asked me what I wanted.

"I came up to—to borrow a book," I faltered, "may I take one home with me?"

Grand-mother was busy with her tea-cups, but she laughed as she answered.

"What a little bookworm it is!" she said softly. And then—"But of course you may take anything you want."

It was then that the kindness of the three ladies was dissolved, as a rainbow dissolves into the darkness.

"Certainly," inquired one of them, with lifted brows, "certainly you do not permit that child to read anything she wants to read?"

"There are books here," another one of the ladies added, "that it is not right for a child to read!" And—

"I would not let the little girl have very many books," the third said sternly, "she will be getting precocious ideas into that small head of hers. I should give her only a few books to read—carefully selected ones!"

I waited, standing first on one foot and then on the other, for grand-mother to speak. And, as I waited, I saw my treasure store being shut away from me—saw my garden of precious facts with a high, blank unclimbable wall all about it.

I waited, and then grand-mother spoke. And when she spoke the weight

One Is Apt to See Only Worth-While Things

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

of apprehension rolled swiftly from my mind.

"I'm afraid," said my grand-mother, and though her voice was exceedingly pleasant the tone of it was firm and decided. "I'm afraid that I can't agree with you. My granddaughter is too young to be hurt by anything that she may stumble upon in a book. The good that she gets from her reading will be far greater than any possible harm! I am sure that she will pass very lightly over any of the things that she does not understand!" And then grand-mother said something, very softly, about the mind of a child.

AS I look back, over the books that I read when I was a very small girl, I am sometimes astounded at the number that I managed to skim through—at the sophisticated titles and subjects that I dipped into. Some of the books I met, years later, in school—some of them I have found in church libraries and old book shops. Some of them I have read again, recently, and I have found many new things in that second reading. And some of them I have understood in a very different way.

I doubt if any of the books in my grand-mother's library were children's books. But they formed the basis of many joyous days, of many bright hours. They, some of them, mentioned subjects that children are unfamiliar with; but none of them had to do with matters that a grown-up would in any way disapprove. And that is why my grand-mother's decision was such a wise one.

If grand-mother, following the advice of her friends, had forbidden me to read any of her books, I might have felt that all books were wrong! I might have thought that there was something bad about the books—I might have thought that my grand-mother read books that weren't proper. There were perhaps things in nearly every volume that might have troubled me—had I noticed them. But I didn't. For the child mind does pass very lightly over places that might be questioned. The child mind takes in only the best.

SOMETIMES I find myself wishing that the people of this world had the ability to see only the good of things, as children do. Sometimes I think that, if they had, the earth would be a very different place. When I read criticisms of things that were never intended to be unpleasant—when I see folk looking for objectionable places in beautiful works of art and literature—I sigh in longing for the child heart that accepts the earth as a wonderful place, and the people of earth as worth while!

It is easy to find unpleasantness in nearly everything—if you are looking for unpleasantness! There's hardly a rose that's perfect, if you pick apart the petals in search of flaws; even the blue sky gets its color from the dust that is in the air. The best people in the world have little habits that are irritating to other folk; the best books in the world might be misunderstood if you insist upon giving certain words and phrases a wrong construction.

Try to look at life and the things of life with the eyes of a child, friends of mine! Try to pass over the bits that might be misunderstood, with a clear mind. Where there is evil—well, that is different! When wrong exists you should try to help exterminate it. But when you have to look for unpleasantness—when you think that you may possibly have misunderstood—be charitable with the clean-hearted charity of a child! For, in looking for faults and unpleasantness, you may miss many of the most beautiful things. In looking for faults and unpleasantness you may come, in time, to the point where you can see only ugliness.

Child eyes are tolerant. And they are kind—kinder than the eyes of grown-ups, often. And they are a living illustration of the old proverb—"Unto the pure all things are pure."

Relief Work in China

I SUPPOSE no one who reads these lines needs to be told that there is a famine in North China. Some of you realize that those of us who are trying to do

How the Various Agencies Are Co-operating in Aiding the Starving

By H. W. ROBINSON (American Board Mission, Paotingfu)

what we can to save life and relieve suffering are in a terribly depressing situation, and you pity us. Someone remarked the other day that all the missionaries in China would need a furlough by next year. Well, it is depressing; and I might give you an account of conditions that would haunt your dreams. But there is another side to the famine situation; and it is this side which helps to keep us out of the slough of despond into which it is so easy to fall.

By the other side of the situation, I mean the responses that are coming in from calls for help, though the responses thus far are nowhere near adequate to the great need; and the hearty co-operation of many races, classes and creeds, even though it is not perfect, on the part of those who are trying to lend a hand to the stricken people. The famine is the greatest unifier I have seen in North China.

In Peking there has been formed an International Union Famine Relief Committee, which is made up of representatives of several nationalities. This committee is concentrating its forces on the territory along the Peking-Hankow Railway as far as Shuntehfu. A similar committee in Tientsin is working along the Tientsin-Pukow Railway. (It is along this line that the American Red Cross with its half million dollars is doing relief work.) Then there are other large committees in cities like Shanghai, Hankow and Mukden, raising funds and helping to administer them. I know little about most of the committees. The one in Peking has its territory divided into four sections, with a Branch International Union Committee located in each of these four regions—Paotingfu, Chengtingfu, Shuntehfu, and Tamingfu.

LET me tell you about one of these branch committees, and I think you will realize better what I mean by hearty co-operation of classes, creeds, and nationalities. A few weeks ago I boarded the train at Paotingfu for Chengtingfu, which is about 100 miles south of here, though it is in territory worked by the Paotingfu Station of the American Board Mission. On the train I joined two other Americans, both of whom were born in China. One of these is giving his whole time to famine relief as traveling secretary of the Peking Committee; the other one is giving up his work as professor in the Yenching University at Peking to go to Shuntehfu to help out there. We three Protestants were met at the Chengtingfu Station by carts from the Catholic Mission, and we were escorted to their large mission compound. We were most cordially received and entertained there by the head of the mission, Father Baroudi, who is a Syrian by birth, but who has been away from his native land so long that he has forgotten his mother tongue. Having been educated in France, he speaks French fluently; but he has not been away from China since he came here thirty years ago.

At the table where we discussed plans for forming an International Union Branch Committee was another priest—a native of Italy, who has been in China for forty years, with only one furlough, and that because of illness. Since I know no Italian, I didn't even learn his Italian name. In Chinese he is known as Father Meng. A third priest in our discussion group was Father Te, as he is called in Chinese. He is a native of Holland. Then there was an Englishman—a representative of the China Inland Mission, which has work in that region; and the S. A. representative was a Swede. Two Chinese—one a Catholic priest, the other a business man—made up the rest of our party. Could you ask for a more heterogeneous group, for the nucleus of a United International Committee? We succeeded in organizing such a committee; and to the various societies mentioned above were added the Standard Oil Company of New York, the British and American Tobacco Company, the French Railway, and the Chinese Merchants Guild of Shin Chia Chuang, where the Committee has located its headquarters because of its being a railway center, and better situated for the purpose than Chentingfu.

The Peking Committee granted to this Chengtingfu Branch Committee $60,000 Mex., most of which is to be used in opening schools for children, and running them for five months. Several schools will be started in each county in the district, and these schools will be centers from which other relief work may be carried on. The children who attend these schools are chosen from the most needy families, without regard to religious affiliation. Each child is given about five cents a day, which is sufficient to purchase enough grain to keep body and soul together.

Representatives from the Shanghai Relief Committee have come to Paotingfu; and have met with the Paotingfu International Committee. These Shanghai men are visiting the various organizations in North China in order that they may know better how to co-operate with other organizations, and I am sure their visit will be another element helping to unify the whole famine relief situation. These meetings help to keep us cheered up, and encourage us to keep going.

THE overhead expenses are kept down to a remarkably low figure. Business men are meeting day after day, after office hours, in committee meetings to help administer funds; missionaries and their Chinese co-workers are giving their whole time to relief work. College professors who could hardly be pried loose for any other cause are leaving their work that they may help; college students are giving up their studies, and volunteering to go out and do relief work. The government railways are issuing free passes for those who are engaged in the work; and they have agreed to move grain and supplies free of charge. Every one seems to want to help.

From other lands also encouraging responses are coming. The American Red Cross is expending half a million dollars down in Shantung in relief work. Letters have come recently telling of the Christian Herald's effort to raise a million dollars for China's famine sufferers. Mission boards are sending out special funds from the home lands. And so I say it is inspiring.

But the need is getting greater every day. The temperature for days has been below zero and as I write the ground is covered with snow, making it very difficult to get fuel from the fields, or to gather the young wheat sprouts, such as many of these people have been living on; and all the time the little that some people have left is getting less.

THE Christian Herald China Famine Fund now totals $468,397.80. The last week's receipts follow:

February 17		$3,213.43
February 18		2,205.78
February 19		1,218.17
February 21		3,347.50
February 23		2,933.82

Grand Total ... $468,397.80

This money has been transmitted to China through the American Committee for China Famine Fund and has been disbursed by the all-American Committee in Peking to the agencies mentioned in Mr. Robinson's letter. What some of the Christian Herald readers' money has accomplished will be told next week.

How To Get Started In Business for Yourself

Are you satisfied with the work you are doing and the future it offers?
Are you making enough money?
Would a pleasant, well-paid business showing a profit of $500 to $1000 a month interest you?
A few weeks' training at the M.S.A.S., the factory endorsed school in Detroit, the auto center, will enable you to have a business of your own.

This free book tells how thousands of ordinary fellows without previous experience and with little or no capital have found

SUCCESS IN THE AUTO INDUSTRY

H. A. BRADLEY was working for $12.00 a week. Says he didn't know a car-buretor from a magnet. He trained at the M. S. A. S. and now has a garage business of his own in Cleveland, paying a profit of over $500 a month.

C. F. SWANSON, of Sioux City, Ia. Before training at the M. S. A. S., Mr. Swanson was working by the day. He now has a business of his own and makes over $500 a month. He attributes his success absolutely to M. S. A. S. training.

THIS IS 20 YEAR OLD BEN KOEHLER of Pulas-ki, Wis. He is conducting a garage of his own. He did $93,810.00 worth of business in the first six months after he started, at a profit of $10,000. Mr. Koehler is an M. S. A. S. graduate.

J. S. STECKLE, of Cop-lay, Pa., was working for small pay. He trained at the M. S. A. S. increased his income to $100 a week. Mr. Steckle also made a good record in the army, due to M. S. A. S. training.

Stewardship Sunday—Jacob's Promissory Note

READ the reference and learn how Jacob vowed a vow to serve God. That vow was "and of all that thou shalt give me, I will surely give the tenth unto thee." The dictionary says that a promissory note is a written agreement to pay a certain sum of money at a fixed date, or on demand to a certain person or his bearer who is ordered to collect. Jacob's promissory note was a stone, which he had set "for a pillar" which was equivalent to a reminder that Jacob would pay into the treasury of God a tenth of his income in payment for mercies and blessings received from the Source of all benevolence.

In this scripture we have a background for the doctrine of Stewardship. This is a doctrine emphasized more and more by all denominations. A tithing Church is the most spiritual Church. The most spiritual Church is the most successful and prosperous. This is not an experiment but an experience.

"A million tithers for Methodism" is the slogan for 1921. It is the aim of the denomination to reach that goal by Sunday, March 20. Read "What Stewardship Did for My Church," by Twelve New England Pastors and "Stewardship Catechism."

Hymns for the Stewardship meeting: "Take My Life and Let it Be," and "We Give Thee But Thine Own."

B. Y. P. U. Mark 16 : 19, 20

ORIGINS are always interesting. Where did we get the name Easter? An old myth says that long ago an egg of great size fell from heaven upon a river. As it rested upon the surface of the waters, doves came and hatched out the egg when from it rose the beautiful goddess of Spring, Eostre. Hence the name Easter. When Christianity brought the beautiful message of Christ's resurrection in the springtime, the old myth gave way to the glorious fact of the new life in Christ, but the egg became a favorite of the season. Since from its shell there came the little winged creature to a new life, it was not an unfitting illustration of the new life that issues in the resurrection.

The resurrection of Jesus is a fitting climax to His wonderful birth and a life on earth. It is the seal of His miracles and His teachings and a proof of His divine claims. It transforms his death from that of a martyr to that of a God. The death of the martyrs of the early Church are inspiring in their fortitude and as an example to us, but the death of Jesus, His resurrection, are a hope and help in life, giving us also an assurance of life to come. The big word in the Easter story is LIFE. Christianity is the creator and perpetuator of life.

Christian Progress in Alaska

C. E. Home Missionary Meeting

ACCORDING to the Interechurch Survey, missionary work in Alaska includes ministry to the natives as well as to the white settlers. The entire population is about 64,000, more than half of which is white. Two-thirds of the white population is composed of Swedish, Norwegian, Canadian, German, Irish, and English.

Hundreds of square miles are without churches. The present situation demands more missionaries, a broader ministry and a more generously supported work so that every occupied place may be reached. Hospitals and doctors are especially needed. At present whatever work is being done is in the hands of the Associated Evangelical Churches of Alaska. This is an organization made up of those missionaries and their agencies, now there, and who have signified their willingness to share in a co-ordinated program for Alaska.

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He named it Powderpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the cement principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

I do be carin' for so much, but Harvey needs me so." Them are her own words, Mr. Richards, sor, an' I'm thinkin' she'd like it if—well—I know, sor, as yer not av my faith, but maybe yo'd kneel wid me just now, beggin' yer pardon, sor, for suggestin' it—"

Harvey slipped quietly down on his knees beside an ancient sofa; Mrs. Kennedy raised supplicating hands. A deep hush, broken only by the heavy breathing of the anxious suppliants, held the room. Harvey's soul was agonizing—petitioning in secret that strength and courage might be given.

A QUICK footstep on the stairs; a benevolent figure in the doorway. Harvey dared hardly stir. A hand fell on his shoulder, another sought his right in a firm clasp.

"Congratulations, Harvey lad. Harvey Junior's crying for his Daddy!"

Harvey drew a hand across his forehead. Drops of moisture stood out, though the December day was the coldest of the season.

"And—Sheila, Doctor?"

"Splendid—brave little woman! Sometimes, lad, our mental sufferings are more terrible than the physical realities, too. Wonderful little girl—oh, these mothers of men!"

"And—may I—?"

"You may. She's asking for you."

Fifteen minutes later, from the sacred mysteries of the room above, Harvey descended the stairs. Old Peters awaited his coming.

"Daddy Peters," he said exultantly, "I want you to forget the speed laws and get me to Chester's faster'n you ever moved in your life."

"Harvey—you think it's wise?"

"Think? There's no thinking about this—I know. I'm going to put across that deal yet, or scalp the whole directorate!"

THE Board of Directors of the Caldwell Company met at three-thirty sharp to consider the matter of placing a contract for certain required machinery. The matter was of sufficient importance to demand higher authority than that of the Purchasing Agent, who ordinarily held the decision in his own hands. Before the long glass-topped table in the mahogany-paneled boardroom stood the P. A. himself, rustling through a pile of specifications and quotations that lay before him. He went through each in turn, explaining. Then he cleared his throat.

"Those are the offers, gentlemen."

"And your recommendation, Mr. Roper?"

He selected two sheaves of papers from the pile. Neither bore the blue embossed lion of the Caldwell Machinery Company.

"It has been difficult to make a selection. There are advantages in all; prices are very close. After careful elimination I find three equally to my taste. Unfortunately for one of them, they sent a poor representative this morning. The choice as I see it lies, therefore, with the other two. Salesmen of both firms are waiting in readiness to answer any questions you gentlemen may care to put. Other things being equal, therefore, I recommend, gentlemen—"

He turned sharply, halting in his speech. A slight confusion at the door had distracted the eyes and attention of all. A diminutive office boy stood in the doorway, apparently blocking the passage of an eager appellant outside.

"Well, Billy?" Impatience was in the President's voice.

"A gentleman to see Mr. Roper, sir. I told him he was busy, but he says it's a matter of life and death."

The purchasing agent frowned.

"If it's Mr. Hodgson again tell him I can't see him now."

"It's not Mr. Hodgson, sir. He's waiting outside."

"Better see him, Roper. We'll wait a moment."

Two minutes later Roper returned, but not alone.

"I am taking the liberty, gentlemen, of introducing Mr. Richards, of the Caldwell Machinery Company." The P. A. smiled, little traces of mischief gathering about his mouth and eyes. "It's probably out of order, but, well, it would take a squad of policemen to hold this young man down. He was a bit upset this morning so I thought you might care to give him a chance to present his case now. He knows his machinery from the ground up."

THE President frowned. Most of the directors followed suit.

"Quite irregular, Roper. He had his chance with the others."

The P. A. coughed apologetically.

"You see, gentlemen," he said, "it happens that Mr. Richards's offer was the third one of which I spoke. I didn't care for Mr. Richards's selling talk this morning. He was not enthusiastic about his own line so I could hardly be expected to enthuse. But—well since then he's become the father of a husky new citizen—How many pounds, Richards?"

"Ten," said Harvey, flushing proudly. "Ten pounds and as fine a looking youngster—"

"I think," interrupted a little old director, who concealed a pair of smiling blue eyes behind gold-rimmed glasses, "that Mr. Richards had better confine himself to machinery. Last time I was here our friend Roper was waxing eloquent on a little bit of humanity that had just arrived at his house, and I thought he'd never leave off. I would move, sir, that we hear Mr. Richards, if he'll promise to limit his remarks to—machinery."

Later Harvey came out into the general offices, arm in arm with the P. A., chatting in the most friendly fashion imaginable. In the outside waiting-room a gentleman rose impatiently, staring at Harvey incredulously.

"Mr. Hodgson!" cried Harvey, staring back.

"Sorry, Hodgson," said the P. A. genially, "but I couldn't really get out to see you, and I couldn't ask you in to the meeting. However, Richards here will give you all the details. He wasn't asked in either, but—well—he invited himself."

A SIFTING of fine snow had been falling all day, but by sunset the air cleared. The clouds, rolling back, hung in heavy bluish masses over the horizon.

Harvey ran lightly up the stairs to his flat, tiptoeing across the floor to the bedroom lest he should disturb those within. But Sheila was awake and waiting. Mrs. Kennedy's sister, who had been tending her, left to get her own supper. Harvey seated himself gingerly by the side of the bed. There, holding her hand tightly in his big one, he told her the good news.

"Oh, Harvey, it's almost too good to be true. And a raise and all. But I knew all along you had it in you, Harvey to do it."

He shook his head doubtfully.

"Maybe," he said slowly, "but it sure wouldn't have come out and given an account of itself if it hadn't been for a brave little woman who showed the way to face and conquer fear."

Through the window golden beams streamed from the breaking clouds in the west, making the delicate tracery of frost on the pane a thing of beauty, touching the auburn head of the woman on the bed with a new glory. The infant at her breast turned his face towards it.

"See," she said, "see how he likes the sunshine already. I'm thinking, Harvey dear, there's more sunshine in life than anything else if we only keep our hearts brave and true. Listen!"

From the other room, into which stray beams had found their way through the open doorway, came a trill of song—pulsing, throbbing notes of liquid melody.

"Dickie likes the sunshine, too," said Sheila. "But do you know the little fellow's been singing all the blessed day, without so much as a ray of sunlight to cheer him. Maybe he knows, Harvey, that it's on the darkest days his song is needed most."

cade of a hundred of the fleetest ponies of the whole district. They were ridden by boys from eleven to twenty years of age who were constantly throwing to the winds printed prayers, supplicating the gods to give them victory.

Then the procession was led off ten miles across the plain to the starting point. Two hours later we watched the thrilling finish. For miles across the plain we could see the stream of contestants galloping in, surrounded by friends and relatives who were shouting encouragement to them. It was a wild-looking cavalcade which swept panting up the hill to the finish, with the stripling who rode his mount to victory wearing a big red swastika on each arm. The whole event reminded one of our American Indians in their sports.

The second feature of the program was under the direction of twenty Lama priests, brilliantly dressed in red and yellow garments. With a beating of drums and blowing of horns they led the procession down to a big bonfire where they burned in effigy the evil spirit. Then for two hours they chanted their scriptures in an unknown tongue and went through an elaborate ceremonial, in which the head man of the tribe took a prominent part. All the officials in attendance were dressed in their gorgeous silk robes, relics of the late Manchu dynasty, with their embroidered insignia and peacock feathers.

The afternoon was given over to wrestling matches between two rival camps. There were twenty or more representatives from each side, and sometimes as many as ten or twelve contestants were on the ground at one time. Each winner received a brick of Russian tea and a money prize.

At the close of the gathering there was a big feast. We tried to avoid this as we had already put our hosts to a great deal of trouble; but the superintendent of the assembly sent over a high official who insisted on our presence. The great dinner, which was served in Chinese fashion, lasted two hours. At the close they gave us the opportunity to express in a few words our appreciation. It was no exaggeration to state that in all the countries we had visited we had never as strangers received anything like the open-hearted hospitality and generosity which they had extended toward us. The address was made in English and had to be interpreted first into Chinese and later into Mongolian.

FROM Khailar we went fifty miles by train and then took a ten-mile cross-country ride in a Russian wagon to a typical Mongolian village. Here there were twenty families living, all related to one another. They were of the official class and quite well-to-do. Like their clothes, their houses were of the Manchu style. Several of the sons in these homes had been educated in the Chinese high school at Tsitsihar. Two of them had been to Peking, while one has had a year in Tokio; but most of the girls and boys have had no education. They are planning to establish a little primary school to meet this need.

The best educated man in the village; Mr. Kuo, became a Christian while a student in the Peking Y. M. C. A. English School. On his return he opened a private school for Mongolian boys in Khailar. This is now being reorganized and receiving the backing of Mongolian officials. We were told that this was the only school for Mongolian children in the whole province, and possibly among the whole Mongolian race.

From this village we made a fifteen-mile trek across the rolling hills and plains of this beautiful country. We had an exciting experience when we came to the river, which two days before had risen so that it could no longer be forded. At no little risk to our lives and our baggage we were ferried across the swift current in a leaky and unstable boat. Our horses were tied together and after much yelling and pelting with sticks and stones were persuaded to swim the river. It took an extra hour to get the clumsy wagon across.

Safe on the other side, we were treated to another delay. Our steady Russian horse had been sent back and the two Mongolian ponies refused to stay harnessed to the unfamiliar Russian wagon. The balky horses won the bout and we had to transfer our baggage to an ox-cart, while we borrowed a well-broken horse to pull the wagon into camp. Shortly before nine o'clock we arrived at the encampment of which our friend's father is the patriarch. The sun was just going down as we ended our journey.

The six large wigwams in which the clan lives are placed in a semi-circle, hundreds of feet across. The spaces between the huts are filled in with the crude ox-carts, thus making a large enclosure, into which each night are driven the 3,000 sheep owned by the family. The 200 cows lie down outside, while the 300 horses stay on the range both summer and winter—only such horses being brought into the encampment as are needed for work. The size of the herds necessitates the frequent moving of the camp. We were fortunate in taking part in one of these migrations. One day the uncle's possessions, which are greater than ours, were moved past our camp in a caravan of wagons a mile in length. This man has a drove of 2,000 horses, worth from $50 to $100 apiece.

THE wigwams, constructed of reeds, are delightfully cool in summer—in fact we slept under blankets and fur coats at night in order to keep warm. In the winter the huts are covered with woolen rugs a quarter of an inch or more in thickness, and the people dress in several layers of sheepskin with the wool left on. The wigwams are circular, averaging fifteen feet in diameter. A large hole is left in the center of the slanting roof to allow the smoke to escape. The fire in the middle of the tent provides light as well as heat in winter and is used for cooking the simple meals. The furniture consists of chests of drawers and cupboards, which are arranged along the wall, as are also the box beds. These are covered in some instances with costly rugs from China or far-off Tibet.

We were surprised to find the women dressed in costly satins going about doing their daily labors. Owing to lack of water supply and other laundry facilities, their garments become very much soiled. The Mongolians themselves testify that they never wash, and one can hardly wonder when they have to go daily three miles for their scant water supply and when the weather is freezing cold for such a large part of the year.

The Mongolians eat only one meal a day. There seems to be no set time for this, although it usually comes at the close of the day's work. In the winter their meals consist almost entirely of beef; in the summer they live on mutton. Our encampment kills a large sheep every day, and it is by far the best mutton I have ever tasted. They have no green vegetables or fruit to break the monotony of their diet. They drink strong tea in which they put scorched rice, milk, and cheese. This they drink all through the day. They are inveterate smokers, puffing lazily at their long pipes from the early morning milking time to the powwow around the evening fireside.

A very interesting feature of the country is the fact that one cannot buy his way into or through it with money, which is held in rather light esteem. Chinese and Russian traders itinerate among the camps and barter supplies for skins and wool. The people live in constant fear of horse-thieves who live in the nearby mountains and who swoop down on their herds from time to time. The wolves also make great inroads on the flocks, and each encampment is alive with fierce dogs which are a real danger to the stranger who comes unescorted to the camp, as they have been known to jump up and drag a man off his horse.

a ceremonial in honor of the departed spirit of a famous medicine man. In a beautiful little valley was a pile of stones marking the grave of the famous man, while on the hill above was an altar for the repose of his spirit. After the meat offerings and liquid oblations had been prepared, the company gathered around the grave of their saint. Two bareback horses were led up to the grave. These were anointed with milk and turned loose for the use of the spirit. Of course they were later captured and will continue to be used by their rightful owner. Oblations of wine were cast to the winds in all directions, while the presents of meat, tea, wine, and sweetmeats, as well as burning incense, were placed in front of the grave.

The present Shaman, or medicine man, a student of the departed, then took charge of the ceremony. He put on a curious hat with a metal bird and other decorations, and clothed himself in a buckskin garment. On his breast were thirty-two polished brass disks, and on the lower part of his garment were sixty sleigh-bells. On his back were placed five large brass plates, such as the Chinese used in olden times for mirrors. The collar of his coat was embroidered with seashells.

With a crude drum in his hand he went through a long ceremonial of dance and incantation. It reached a climax when he fell in a faint from exhaustion and dizziness. He was brought to by putting pungent incense under his nose and then he rolled on the ground around the grave three times. After repeated supplications to the spirit of the departed to come unto him and help him prophesy, he finally was supposed to have been taken possession of by the spirit, and through him gave counsel to sick folk and to those who were seeking enlightenment. Miraculous cures and wonderful prophecies are ascribed to these men. We came away with a feeling of great pathos for these people sitting in darkness and with not a single witness among them for Jesus Christ.

The Sabbath we were in Khailar our friends came to us asking that we conduct a Christian service for them, which we were glad to do. They said it was the first Christian service which had ever been held there. We had no Bible nor hymnals in Mongolian, but as several of them knew Chinese we used that language and had it explained to the women and children in Mongolian. Each night after that the little boys came in for a story, and we told them one of the Bible narratives such as the story of David and Goliath.

Again, in the distant village we held the only Christian service which has ever been conducted there. On the Mongolian plain in our friend's home we had the opportunity to speak of Jesus Christ where He had never before been named. We had long talks with the blind patriarch of the clan who came to our tent nearly every day for a visit with us. He is an ardent Buddhist and spends hours every day telling his beads and mumbling his prayers. He also showed us his interesting Tibetan prayer-wheel. We have tried to make clear to him the more excellent Way and to give him a deeper knowledge of God and of our Saviour, Jesus Christ. He was interested in the story of the Creation, in the birth of Jesus, and we had a long talk about the reality of prayer. Our presence gave the Christian son an opportunity to testify to his belief in a way that would have been impossible without our visit. One has to understand the Oriental family relationship to fully comprehend this. The eagerness with which our messages have been received, the heavenly hunger, and the spiritual need revealed, created in us a longing to be able to speak to these people in their own tongue and a desire to stay with them to help them come to know their Saviour.

BAGGAGE men were somewhat rough in their handling of four cases of eggs being shipped through a Southern state and breakage resulted. The odor which spread around caused an immediate investigation. Then it was found that the natural contents of each egg had been blown out, and the shell refilled with whisky and sealed. Prohibition can not be so ineffective after all if the ill vendors find such a ruse is necessary.

EASTER SALE

Of this superb combination Teachers' and Students' Genuine American Standard

BIBLE AT THE STARTLINGLY LOW PRICE OF $2.85 Mailed Postpaid

IMPORTANT! We were able to secure only 3000 of these wonderful Nelson American Standard Bibles to dispose of at this price. They are nearly all sold. The remaining 400 will not be sufficient for one tenth of the students and teachers who want this splendid Bible, which now costs over 15% more to produce than when we secured this lot for you.

THE American Standard Bible should be in every Christian home. Get a copy of this wonderful book; compare the faithful accuracy of its translations, the beauty of its diction, with all other versions that have gone before; enjoy the purity of its language; line for line, word for word, its value to you who cherish the Word of God is so apparent and becomes so real, that you will never again be without this priceless book.

Every detail of this Bible is perfect: the binding is not cheap, inferior leather commonly used in Bibles costing much more. It is genuine leatheroid, with a beautiful Morocco grain, which makes it not only look better, but it is guaranteed to outwear two ordinary leather bindings. Its superb Bible paper, its red under gold edges, its clear, easily readable type, its splendid workmanship, place it in a class by itself. It contains in addition to the beautifully printed text:

4000 QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS A feature wonderful study help for both teacher and scholar and makes it a truly remarkable combination Bible. These questions leave no important event in the Sacred Story untouched. The questions go below the surface of text or story, and the answers give the sincere inquirer after the truth a fund of information that places teacher or student in a peculiarly advantageous position with relation to Bible knowledge.

31 BEAUTIFUL FULL PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS in the soft Sepia print. These are pictures that really illumine the text, arouse interest, grip the attention of Bible students and satisfy the imagination.

25 OUTLINE MAPS, 12 COLORED MAPS So many maps are rarely found in a Bible at anywhere near the price of this truly remarkable production of the printer's art, and the possession of a Bible containing these valuable maps gives you a distinct advantage over those not having access to so large and excellent a collection.

SATISFACTION ABSOLUTELY GUARANTEED Money back for the asking. Order at once, for the Easter demand this year will be greater than last year, which broke all our Easter records for Bible sales.

disposition, which it is respectfully submitted cannot be undertaken or effected without its consent." The members of the Council wired the text of the note to their governments at once, and discussed its contents at length at their next session, but they attempted to reach no decision regarding their answer pending the receipt of orders from their governments. European statesmen were inclined to take the view that the United States government was attempting to occupy the position of a judge of review on the acts of the League. The controversy over this may be expected to provide a problem for the Harding administration and to cause a prolonged transatlantic debate, especially since so many of the acts of the League will affect American interests.

DOMESTIC

NEW YALE HEAD SELECTED. Dr. James Rowland Angell, famous educator and chairman of the trustees of the Carnegie Corporation, has been elected to succeed Dr. Arthur T. Hadley as president of Yale University, and is the first man not a Yale graduate to be selected as its executive head. Dr. Angell was graduated in 1890 from the University of Michigan, of which his father was president for many years, and among the important positions he has held was that of acting president of the University of Chicago.

SENATE PASSES IMMIGRATION BILL. The Senate has passed the Dillingham Immigration bill, which provides that after April 1 the number of persons admitted from any country in one year shall not exceed three per cent. of the number of persons of such nationality resident in the United States in 1910. This would limit immigration in any fiscal year to 355,461. Prompt action was to be sought in the House.

EIGHT LOSE LIVES IN TROLLEY COLLISION. Eight persons were killed and twenty injured in the collision of two trolley cars near Bridgeport, Conn., most of the deaths being due to the explosion of a can of gasoline which a passenger was carrying.

THREE CONVICTED IN BUILDING CASE. John T. Hettrick, a lawyer who originated a "code of practices" by which contracts for buildings were divided among New York City contractors, and three associates were convicted of coercion and received indeterminate sentences of three months to three years in the Blackwell's Island penitentiary.

FOREIGN

JAPAN APOLOGIZES TO UNITED STATES. The Japanese Government has expressed "deep regret" for the killing of Lieutenant W. H. Langdon, of the United States navy, by a Japanese sentry at Vladivostok. Major-General Nishihara, the Japanese commander, who was held chiefly responsible, was removed from the active list of the army and deprived of his command and of the rank of brigade commander. Four subordinate officers received prison terms. The sentry was exonerated because he had obeyed orders, but was imprisoned for a month for giving false testimony.

DISARMAMENT DISCUSSION BEGINS. The consultative military and naval commissions of the League of Nations have begun the discussion of the disarmament question, in Paris.

TURKISH TREATY BEING REVISED. A conference for the revision of the peace treaty with Turkey has been in progress in London, with representatives of the Turkish Nationalist and Constantinople governments and of Greece holding sessions with Allied delegates, but little progress apparently has been made toward an agreement which would restore order in the former Ottoman Empire.

(d) Decrease (g) Merged with Northern Presbyterian (h) No returns gathered for 1920

Age is not measured by years

HEALTH itself determines the length of life and your enjoyment of it. Because of their physical well-being, many people in advanced years carry youth well into later life. Their joys, their pleasures, their whole outlook on life is that of youth. The eminent bacteriologist, Metchnikoff, claimed that "old age" is due in great part to poisons generated in the intestinal canal.

Cumulative Effect

As the dropping of water wears away the stone, so does the continued action of intestinal poisons enfeeble the body. Constipation of long standing is responsible for many of the maladies of old age—hardened arteries, high blood pressure, hemorrhoids (piles), kidney and bladder troubles, and the like. It favors the advance of asthma, catarrh, rheumatism, and other ailments that bring discomfort and suffering to those in later life.

After Life's Noon

Elderly people are usually deficient in intestinal mucus—that fluid normally secreted in the intestinal tube to assist the passage of food waste. Nujol takes the place of this deficient mucus. It lubricates the intestines, and penetrates and helps to remove hardened layers of matter that often adhere to the bowel walls. It soothes irritated or abraded spots. It absorbs many poisons and carries them out of the body.

Nujol is prescribed by leading medical authorities as a safe and efficient aid to health in advanced years as it relieves constipation without any unpleasant or weakening effects. By softening the food waste it enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze this waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system. Nujol prevents constipation because it helps Nature to maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation at regular intervals—the healthiest habit in the world. Questions and Answers

A NUMBER of our readers, having special experience in the spiritual training of children, have sent us helpful suggestions on that subject for the benefit of others. I. S., New Britain, Conn., writes:

"I was quite interested in the request of Mrs. S. W. C., of St. Joseph, Mo., for suggestions in regard to Sunday. I would refer her to the chapter on Sunday in Louisa Alcott's Book 'Little Men.' 'Aunt Joe' has a wonderful Sunday program for the entire day, both for the younger and older children. It certainly carries out her ideas which she embodies in these words: 'I want my boys to love Sunday, and find it a pleasant day, when they can rest from common study and play, yet enjoy quiet pleasures.' In the afternoon they have a walk with some older person as leader who shows them the beautiful things in Nature, and finds 'Sermons in stones, books in the running brooks, and good in everything.' After supper, there is a story hour, and then singing, in which every one joins, and some of the children play on musical instruments. With a little perseverance and painstaking on the part of their elders children can be brought to regard Sunday as a happy day."

Mrs. Hannah A. Green, Cedar Vale, Kansas, sends this suggestion: "It would be very profitable and interesting, I think, to commit Bible verses, one or many. Call the children's attention to the grandeur and beauty in nature that our dear All-Father has spread so lovingly and bountifully for us to admire—birds, stones, shells, flowers, green grass and many things. A small magnifying glass would be very interesting to examine even hands and finger tips. If the children have not already learned it, teach them the verse, 'Suffer the children to come.' (Matt. 19, 14; Mark 10, 14; Luke 18, 16.) If the grandmother will write to me I will send her some verses of poetry which the children may enjoy."

J. E. F., Oneonta, N. Y., writes: "I noticed in the Mail-Bag a letter from a grandmother who desired to know how to encourage little folks on the Sabbath so that it might be a 'day of days' to the children. Last winter I had two little girls, from the street, aged nine and eleven. The mother was dead. They were with me about three months, until places could be found for them. When they first came, I wondered what I would do with them on Sundays. I decided we would go to church and Sunday School and I went with them. Then I thought what we should do after dinner. I told them they could get their paper dolls for a while, which they did, and played with them until the dinner work was out of the way. Then they wanted something else. I had a Young People's Bible which interested me when a child and I got the book and asked them if I should read to them. They said: 'Oh, yes; do so.' I sat down with a girl on either side, and read to them. I think they would have listened till bedtime, if I had read so long. Some of the stories they became very familiar with, but the ones they loved best were Ruth and Naomi and Samuel and David. Then when the shadows began to creep in and it was too dark to see to read, we had a heart to heart visit and sang and our Sabbath was at an end. I think it was a Day of days to them and that a taste for good reading is being formed which I hope will go with them through life."

C. H. M., Saluvia, Pa., writes: "I think the great trouble is that children are not taught proper love for God and obedience, early enough in life. As early as I can remember my mother took us on her lap every evening, and told us Bible stories and the love of God, and taught us to love and obey God. It was our greatest desire, as we grew up, to obey and not grieve God but to do those things which are pleasing to Him. There were a few in those days perhaps too strict, and who made the Sabbath dreary; but they were very few. Our home was bright and cheerful. We were read to, and encouraged to read, the Bible, good books and Sunday School papers. Sometimes we took a quiet walk with our parents in the fields and woods, and viewed all the beautiful things God has made. Let us strive to do His will and only those things that are pleasing to Him."

Mrs. J. P. M., Muncy Valley, Pa., writes: "I look forward every week for the Christian Herald. I have taken it many years and hope to read it as long as I live. I would say to Mrs. S. M. C., St. Joseph, Mo., who has the care of three grandchildren, that I had three sons of five, seven and ten years. I bought a book, the title of which was 'Happy Sundays with the Bible and our Children,' by Charlotte M. Yonge, which has a lesson for every Sunday in the year. I would read a lesson every Sunday afternoon or evening, and then ask them questions about it. I read it to turn for three successive years and think it was a great help to them in their Sunday School work. They are now grown up and are good men."

L. M. H., Pittsburg, Pa. The talents referred to in the parable (in Matt. 25.) were intended to apply to every kind of gift or endowment. Wealth, education, spiritual privilege, opportunity were all included. It is the duty of each individual to turn to good account such talents as he has. He will not be blamed if he is not able to do quite as much as another who, with a larger endowment of talents, is better equipped. The distinction between worldly and spiritual gifts is not very definite, but we have no reason in the parable itself for excluding spiritual equipment, in considering the proposition as a whole. It is for all to do the best we can always and under all existing circumstances.

W. J. McF., Vermilion, Ill., writes: 'Concerning the recent question and answer—'Where were the disciples on the day of Pentecost?' (in the Mail-Bag of January 1)—permit me to suggest that as neither the 'temple' nor the 'upper room' was directly indicated, and as no priests or scribes were mentioned, and as no ascent seemingly interrupted the gathering together of the multitude around the disciples, who were yet 'sitting' till Peter 'stood up,' it seems not impossible that the Pentecostal occurrence was neither at the temple nor in the upper room, as commonly supposed, but simply at a house where they had assembled for fellowship or communion. It is worthy of note that, though the disciples returned from the ascension directly to the upper room and dwelt there, and though they also 'were continually in the temple praising and blessing God,' (Luke 24: 53), yet they also were 'breaking bread from house to house' (Acts 2: 46)."

W. W. S., Calamus, Ia. Fatima was the name of the daughter of the Prophet Mohammed. No such name is to be found in Scripture.

Mrs. W. D., Rochester Mills, Pa. The rabbis—a title of honor given by the Jews to their learned men—were originally the authorized teachers of the law and the spiritual heads of the community. There were rabbinical degrees, varying according to spiritual authority and intellectual acquirements. The Scribes were originally writers or copyists of the law, but eventually they became interpreters and teachers of Scripture, and in the Gospel times they had a powerful influence in the religious life of the Jewish people. The Pharisees were one of the Jewish sects or orders in the time of Christ. In a sense, all might be regarded as teachers.

R. S., De Soto, Mo. Jesus not only said "Love your enemies," but also "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him to drink." You say in your letter that you have not seen anything of this spirit in our attitude toward Central Europe. You have surely been strangely unobservant. Even while the war was still raging, American help was being given to hundreds of thousands of the starving wives and children of our enemies wherever they could be reached. The Christian Herald had relief committees practically in all the European warring countries, save Russia, which declined help. And the aid that America as a nation gave to the devastated countries as soon as the way was opened, has become a part of history. That work is still going forward on a very large scale.

C. R. C., Rochester, N. Y. If both parties are of one mind with regard to the religious training of their children, as your letter states, we see no reason why they should not harmonize other differences.

The plain truth about Teeth

Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is not advertised as a cure-all to do what can be done only by a dentist.

It is recommended simply as a safe, common sense dentifrice, which cleans the teeth by direct application. It contains no acids that are supposed to dissolve hard, clinging deposits.

Such deposits should be removed by a dentist. Acids strong enough to dissolve them may injure the gums, the delicate tissues of the mouth, and even the teeth themselves.

The common sense way of keeping the teeth in good condition is to clean them, night and morning, with Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream, and have them examined at least twice a year by a dentist.

With Colgate's, the habit of brushing the teeth is easily formed. If you have had trouble getting your children to take care of their teeth, start them with Colgate's. The use of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is a treat, not a task.

More dentists recommend Colgate's than any other dentifrice

EASTER WEATHER

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A SOFT wind blew across my face; a wind that sang little songs, and breathed wee fragrant secrets, and murmured small happy words. And I lifted my eyes to the sky—gray-veiled by the smoke of a thousand chimneys—and forgot that I was standing on New York's busiest corner.

All around me swirled crowds—women in shiny straw hats, men in spring overcoats, and little children in half socks and strapped slippers. I wondered, as I watched a fluffy cloud drift through the gray smoke, if any of them were hearing the voice of the wind—as I was hearing it. Perhaps the children were conscious of it—passing lightly over its subtleties—but the men and women were far too hurried, every one of them, to pay heed to vague songs and vaguer secrets. They were too busy to even know that it was Easter Weather!

With a start, almost, I brought my eyes back to the hurrying street. On New York's busiest corner one does not watch the sky, over-long. Sky-gazing is apt to draw a crowd in New York. And a crowd is, almost, unlawful! It would be hard to explain—to a policeman with not much imagination—that a cloud looked like a fairy's pillow.

I brought my eyes back to the hurrying street. And there, on the corner opposite me, I saw a flower man with a tray of violets in his hands. They were hot-house violets, tortured into stiff little bunches, but from across the street one could only see that they were fashioned of a heavenly color. From across the street one could only dream the sweetness of them. Violets—in the city!

The crowds surged past the flower man. They jostled him this way and that, in their eagerness for speed. He did not sell many flowers, but I somehow felt that, even though he did not sell many of them, he was happier than the people who hurried by. For they were passing a little garden, all unseeing. And he, despite the city, was holding a garden in his two hands!

THEY used to grow in great purple beds—the violets. When the meadows were gay with Easter weather, they used to make a carpet, almost, in the quiet places. One seldom spoke aloud, when the violets were a-bloom—there was something nearly solemn about them. They were so shy themselves, and so silent; unlike the roses of June, that seem to hum gently to each other, and the dahlias of the late summertime—that almost shout aloud, so riotously colorful they are! They were so still that we used to walk among them on tip-toe, speaking in whispers.

We always felt, there in the meadows, that God was very near. We didn't exactly think it in a conscious way—for we were only children—but we thought it, nevertheless. Perhaps the violets thought it, too, for they bowed their heads, ever so reverently, each time a tiny breeze crept by.

We often wondered why the violets were such silent flowers. We used to tell ourselves, without speaking it out, that they were quiet because they bloomed so early. If they had hummed like the roses of June, if they had dared to shout as the dahlias shout, they might have called the Winter back again. And then the frost would have pinched them, and the chill winds would have broken them, and the snow would have buried them. By keeping silent they passed unnoticed by the retreating Winter!

Perhaps that was why, too, they hid under their broad green leaves and did not bloom in the open like the rest of the flowers. One has to search out violets, more than any other flower except the arbutus—and the arbutus blooms, too, in Easter weather.

But perhaps they did not hide because they were afraid. Perhaps they only hid because they were too shy, too modest, to show their beauty to the world. There are people like violets, who bury their personalities under a commonplace exterior; people whose souls are as fragrant and as beautiful as purple blossoms. The pity of it is that sometimes they wither and die—and no one has sought them out!

THOUGHT-WORDS came easily when one went violet hunting. Lovely words like "dewy" and "misty" and "elusive" and "slim" and "delicate." Words that were as light as a sunbeam's fingers laid across a baby's hair—never heavy words, or ugly words.

Sometimes the words flew straight into lines—like birds going south and sometimes they made verses. Not rhymed verses like they would today, for we knew nothing about rhymes. And yet they were more real, more sincere, perhaps, than any other poems that we have written since we grew up. For they came directly from our souls and were never profaned by the pencil and paper of commerce—and we often times write poetry, now, because an editor wants to buy some, or because there is a long thin space in the middle of a page of type that needs to be filled.

Some of the thought-words that flew into lines were like this, only not rhymed:

When God smiles down on earth's green face.
He thinks that every level plain
Misty with violets, sweet with rain,
Is just another Heaven place!

And some of them were like this—only far better and much easier to understand:

A dewy bed of violets,
A-bloom in Easter weather,
Is like a sweet elusive song,
And like harp music, soft yet strong,
And rainbows, slim and pale and long,
All melted up together!

WE HAD two flat bowls, on the lowest shelf of our china-closet. And one of them was a yellow bowl, and one of them was a gray bowl. And when we put a great mass of violets into the yellow bowl they seemed suddenly to become joyous, and their small golden hearts flamed with light. And we wanted to skip about the room and clap our hands and sing the sunny little songs that they taught us in school. And when our mother asked us why we were so hilarious we would stop skipping, and hang our head, and not know quite what to answer.

But if we placed the violets—gathered very carefully so that their stems were as long as possible—into the gray bowl, the effect was very different. Then the gold of their hearts seemed to fade into a mysterious, almost colorless tint and the purple grew darker and more velvety. And then we wanted to creep away in to some quiet place and repeat over the psalm that we had learned because it was grandmother's favorite.

When the violets in the yellow bowl or in the gray bowl were faded we used to empty them, ever so gently, into the long grass that grew in the back yard. We couldn't bear to throw them into the trash basket; it might have hurt their feelings. And sometimes a few of them weren't quite faded and those we would carefully pick out and place between the pages of some well loved Green and Gold Book. Sometimes, even yet, we come upon the wan little ghosts of them—for we still love our Green and Gold Books. And when we lift them, between a careful thumb and forefinger, they disappear—and only a thin film of dust is left. And sometimes the type of the Green and Gold Book grows dim for a moment, and hard to read. For we cannot help remembering that our yesterdays—when we picked violets in the glad sunlight of the Easter weather—have become only little thin films of dust, too!

A SOFT wind blew across my face today—a wind that sang the songs of youth and whispered the secrets of childhood and murmured the story of Easter weather. And overhead a little white cloud, almost like a fairy's pillow, swept across the sky—blotting out the smoke of a thousand chimneys. And as I stood on New York's busiest corner, feeling almost like an island—because the people who hurried past me were like the waves of the sea—I saw that a flower man was standing on the opposite corner with a tray of violets in his hands.

I wonder if he realized, when I crossed the street and purchased a stiff little bunch of hot-house violets from him, that I was buying something more precious than flowers? I wonder if he could guess that I was very far away from New York's busiest corner as I paid him the silver coin that he asked for? I wonder if he knew that I was seeing visions and dreaming dreams?

Somehow I can't help thinking that he did know. For he smiled at me just a trifle wistfully, as I pinned the violets against the dark cloth of my coat and his eyes were soft with understanding.

President Warren G. Harding emphasizing a point in his inaugural address

Moving Day in Washington

Mr. Harding Takes Office with Simple Ceremonies

By DONALD MAC GREGOR

CARPENTERS have knocked apart the flag-draped inauguration stand in front of the Capitol in Washington; the stirring strains of "The Star Spangled Banner" have died away, echoing and re-echoing to the Virginia hills across the Potomac; the clatter of the cavalry escort up Pennsylvania avenue is just a memory—Warren G. Harding is President of the United States.

Woodrow Wilson, the most conspicuous figure in the World War, now feeble and gray, intends to practice law in Washington just as he did in Georgia forty years ago; Democratic policies have given way to those of the Republicans; new faces are to be seen in Federal offices throughout the nation—the American Government is in new hands.

The Harding administration is as yet merely an infant, but able to talk and walk. Hovering near, the American people, as a fostering parent, through adoption recorded by the heavy majority at the polls last November, is expectant, anxious, hopeful. Within a brief span the infant will be full grown, for one of the remarkable things about new administrations is that they mature rapidly. At four they are in their prime and, if they live to be eight, it is the end.

March 4, 1921, may be checked off on the calendar as one of the most remarkable inauguration days witnessed in the recent history of the republic. Curiously lacking, at the specific request of Mr. Harding, was the pomp and ceremony of previous inauguration days. There was an undercurrent of sadness about it all, emphasizing the many serious problems of reconstruction that will confront the people of the United States for the next few years as an aftermath of the World War.

SIMPLY an automobile ride from the White House to the Capitol and back again, the round trip little more than two miles in all; just a quiet ceremony that required less than half an hour; an oath administered by the Chief Justice of the United States; a pledge to the people by the man who had assumed the responsibilities of serving as their Chief Executive for four years to come, and that was all. But a change in administration had been made, the work of Government put into the hands of a new group with new hopes and fresh ideals while those who had done the service for eight momentous years stepped into the background as private citizens.

The eventful happenings of March 4 began at half-past ten in the morning, when Warren G. Harding, of Marion, Ohio, stepped out of the Presidential suite of the New Willard hotel and hurried to a waiting automobile in historic Pennsylvania Avenue. Within the brief span of nine months he had developed from a State to a National figure. He had been in Washington for six years as a United States Senator from Ohio, brushing shoulders, unnoticed, with the man in the street. But, as the choice of considerably more than half the people of the nation to be the President, after a spectacular campaign involving world principles of the most tremendous magnitude, he came forward as a new leader, a public hero to be applauded and cheered.

The Warren G. Harding who stepped into the bright sunshine of that crisp March day I had happened to know more than ten years before, when he ran for Governor of Ohio. He lost that race, but the Republican principles for which he fought led him forward, undaunted, until he had been designated, not as Chief Executive of the State, but of the Nation.

Mr. Harding, bronzed after five weeks in Florida, where he worked as well as played, looked much the same as he did when he entered public life. It speaks well for his way of living. There is a tinge of gray in his hair and he is, perhaps, a trifle too heavy, but he is youthful in appearance, his step itself revealing vigor. He wore a modish overcoat, of very dark blue and a black silk hat—silk hats always were, of course, and undoubtedly always will be a part of the inauguration scenery and no inconsiderable part at that.

IN THE automobile with the chairman of the Joint Congressional Inauguration Committee, Senator Philander C. Knox, of Pennsylvania, and Representative "Uncle Joe" Cannon, of Illinois, Mr. Harding went to the White House, only three blocks from the hotel, to accompany Woodrow Wilson, the retiring President, to the Capitol. That is the long-established custom, pursued since the birth of the republic.

Mr. Wilson joined the party, presently, in the Blue Room of the White House, where they were waiting. The exchange of greetings was entirely formal, but friendly. The stop at the White House required fifteen minutes.

Outside the White House, in the wide gravel driveway, were eleven waiting automobiles, for the accommodation of the President, the President-elect, the members of the committee, the wives of the chief figures in the drama then in the writing, and a few others whose duty took them there. In the street beyond, across a wide lawn kept very green by a mild Washington winter, a squadron from the Third Cavalry Regiment, stationed at Fort Myer, Va., across the Potomac, stood in a long line at ease, but ready to resume attention at instant command.

The doors of the White House swung open. Out stepped the President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, with Mr. Harding at his left. Mr. Wilson stood for an instant gazing at the group in front of him and the cavalry and the crowds in the street beyond.

To those who knew Mr. Wilson in his prime it was a painful moment. It used to be he stood a good six feet, with straight shoulders, keen, quick, alert. But when he emerged from the White House for the last time he was a physically broken President, very gray, very stooped, leaning heavily on a cane and walking slowly. The eighteen months' illness which began when he was stumping the country to win support for the League of Nations had left its print.

Mr. Wilson walked hesitatingly across the portico to the waiting automobile. His feebleness was emphasized by the vigor of the man beside him who was to take up the work where he had left it off. He looked neither right nor left, but, with the help of the cane continued on to the entrance of the machine.

President and Mrs. Harding at the entrance to the White House

Here he hesitated, but two White House attendants hurried to his aid, half-lifting him, gently to the seat.

Then occurred a dramatic incident. Mr. Wilson, unable to turn fully because of his condition, raised his hat, silently and without change of expression. It seemed as though he were bidding good-bye to the White House. In this everybody who saw the incident did not agree. Some thought he meant the farewell to those who, as members of the White House staff, had been with Mr. Wilson for the last eight years. The probability is he intended the salutation for both the White House and the staff.

THE automobile which carried the two foremost figures in the great national drama moved slowly down the driveway, hesitating a moment at the huge iron gate, then swinging into the street, where the cavalry squadron took up the duty of escort. Within an instant the machine, trailed by the other ten, was on its way up Pennsylvania avenue to the Capitol. Crowds lined the course—crowds ten deep on the sidewalks, crowds on the tops of buildings, in windows, everywhere. There was cheering all along the route.

As the Presidential automobile rounded the corner, turning to the left, at the Peace monument, the first brass band—strange indeed in an inaugural ceremony—was encountered. It was the band of the Harding-Coolidge club, of Washington, D. C., and it blazed away with jazz. Swinging up the hill, the sun by this time, as noon approached, increasing its daze, the Presidential party hesitated near the entrance to the Senate wing of the Capitol.

There was a nod. Few words were spoken.

Mr. Harding and those who accompanied him as chairmen of the inauguration committee, Senator Knox and "Uncle Joe," left the automobile at the Senate steps, while the President continued on around the corner. Health broken, crippled, he could not go up the steps as the others could; he depended on an elevator which he could reach through one of the side entrances, a freight entrance, in fact, to the Capitol building.

As Mr. Wilson appeared inside the Capitol a negro messenger spied him and, anxious to help, rushed for a wheel chair which had been used for a time by Senator Penrose, whose long illness recently had made it

New Progress Toward Christian Unity

OF THE three great conferences on Christian unity held in the last twelve months—Lambeth, Geneva and St. Louis—I think St. Louis is the greatest," said Rt. Rev. Nicholai Velimirovic, Bishop of Serbia, "because all the movements for Christian unity are represented here and all are free to speak without regard to position." Bishop Nicholai is one of the most distinguished prelates of the Eastern Orthodox Church, with its 130,000,000 members, and doubtless is the best-known prelate beyond the borders of that Church. He landed in New York a few days before the conference and sat through most of its sessions.

At the instance of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, Baltimore, Maryland, the St. Louis Conference on Christian Unity was held February 2-4. This Association, which had its beginning at the General Convention of the Disciples at Topeka, Kansas, in 1910, is a part of the 1910 Christian unity movement. That year was the most notable year in Christian unity movements. The same day that the Disciples organized their Association the Protestant Episcopal Church, meeting in its General Convention in Cincinnati, appointed its Commission on a World Conference on Faith and Order. In that year also the Congregationalists, meeting in their National Council in Boston, appointed a commission on Christian Union; the Presbyterians and Anglicans in Australia and Tasmania appointed commissions for approaches toward each other; and the Eastern Orthodox Church took up for consideration for the first time in its history approaches toward the Churches of the West. So that whatever one may think of the nature of any one of these movements, or all of them combined, no one can deny the significance of these occurrences at the same time and in various parts of the world.

The Association's task, however, has been dealing with matters relative to methods and its definite program is intercessory prayer, friendly conferences, and the distribution of irenic literature. Its conception has been that none of these movements are competitive or antagonistic to each other, but instead each supplements the other. The purpose of the St. Louis Conference was not only to demonstrate this, but to make a definite advance in Christian unity thought by passing from a carefully selected group for a conference behind closed doors to opening it to the public generally, where all might share in its discussions and get at first-hand the problem as specialists see it.

THE most outstanding movements for Christian unity were represented there by those who had a part in the starting of those movements or by its present chief officials, so that the whole presentation was first-hand work.

St. Louis and Dallas Conferences Bring Churches Closer Together

By REV. PETER AINSLIE, D.D.

The Lambeth Appeal was presented by Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, Bishop of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, who was a member of the special committee last summer of the Lambeth Conference on its message relative to the reunion of Christendom. The World Conference on Faith and Order was presented by Mr. Robert H. Gardiner, Gardiner, Maine, who has been secretary of the Commission on the World Conference from its origin in 1910. He has conducted correspondence with the Church in all parts of the world, and, as he said, there is hardly a post office on the remotest part of the globe to which literature regarding Christian unity has not gone. The American Council on Organic Union of Evangelical Protestants was presented by Mr. Henry W. Jessup, New York, to whom perhaps more than any other man is due the credit of framing this special plan of Protestant union, which grew out of the call of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. in 1918. The World Alliance for International Friendship through the churches was presented by Rev. Nehemiah Boynton of New York, chairman of its Executive Committee, and who has been definitely associated with it since its beginning in 1914. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America was presented by Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, New York, who has been the general secretary since a few years after its organization in 1908, succeeding Rev. E. B. Sanford, its first secretary. The Universal Conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work was presented by Rev. Frederick Lynch, New York, who was one of the founders of this movement at Geneva last summer and is now one of its general secretaries.

One of the larger rooms in the Sunday-school section of the Second Baptist Church had been selected for the place of meeting, but half an hour before opening the first session this room was so overcrowded that the large auditorium had to be opened, and before the first day's sessions were closed six to eight hundred persons were there. Twenty-two denominations were represented from eighteen states, some representatives traveling more than a thousand miles to attend.

The evening sessions dealt with Christian unity in general. Canon Samuel McComb of the Episcopal Cathedral, Baltimore, spoke on "Causes of Disunion and the Path to Reconciliation"; Rev. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, New York, spoke on "Christian Unity in Foreign Missionary Fields"; Bishop Nicholai spoke on "The Call of a United Church for Europe";

Dr. Lynch and Dr. Boynton spoke on "Christian Unity and the Present World Situation."

Every speaker was free, and their utterances indicated careful and advanced thought, whether speaking from the theological, ethical or social approaches. This entire group was pronouncedly of one mind and that mind was for the unity of the Church of God. Bishop Nicholai speaks good English and his addresses made a profound impression, while his prayer brought all to the throne of grace with a challenging sense of brotherhood among all Christians.

One of the most interesting sessions was when eight denominations answered the question "What Does My Denomination Mean by 'the Church' and 'Church Unity?'" It was answered in ten to fifteen minute addresses by representatives of the Protestant Episcopalians, Methodists, General Evangelical Synod, United Lutherans, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Disciples, and Baptists. One could not see any wide differences, however, in the interpretations of these addresses, indicating again the removal of the barriers between the denominations.

THE St. Louis Conference was followed by a similar conference in Dallas, Texas, where Rt. Rev. George H. Kinsolving, Bishop of Texas, interpreted the Lambeth Appeal; Rev. F. W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society, St. Louis, spoke for the World Conference on Faith and Order, and also the Universal Conference on Life and Work; Rev. Ivan Lee Holt, pastor of St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church, South, spoke for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and delivered one of the evening addresses on "The Place of Unity in the Church," while the writer represented the World Alliance of International Friendship through the Churches and spoke as occasion served. This conference was attended by twelve communions, including Roman Catholics, and a hearty request came from the audience for a similar conference to be given there again next winter.

More and more is it becoming evident that among the various Protestant bodies, genuine Christian brotherhood is the greatest need of these times. In the multiplication of conferences, like those at St. Louis and Dallas, a conscience will be created for brotherhood of the whole Church that will supplant denominational conscience, which is brotherhood for only a part of the Church.

The Spirit of God can only function through a united Church. The day is approaching when necessity will be laid upon all who believe in Jesus as Lord and Saviour to seek diligently for the paths of reconciliation; for we must include the wholeness of life, if we would go to the task of saving the whole world.

A Matter of Flowers

An Easter Story

By BERTHA HELEN CRABBE

Illustrated by Anne Brockman

"I CAN'T paint pictures nor play the piano nor write books, but flowers will grow for me. Sara Haskins drew her crooked little body to its full height, her eyes shone. "No, I can't do any of those things and I've got a bad hip and I'm not beautiful, nor over-heavy endowed with the world's goods, but I do have the best luck with plants!" There was a lift of triumph in her voice. She fairly trembled with pride as she looked at her three callers.

"That is so," her sister-in-law put in, her face beaming with reflected glory. "There isn't anybody in this village that has such flowers as Sara's. She says she don't know what she's done to deserve it that flowers should grow so good for her, but I tell her she just loves 'em into growing, and that's the truth. She couldn't tend 'em better if they were so many babies. And times when the callas are goin' to bloom—land, it's like somebody had one of those sponge cakes made without baking-powder, in the oven. Me and the children have to walk with light feet, I tell you, and there mustn't be a draft and the cat mustn't get in the flower-room and we hardly dast speak above a whisper for fear those calla buds will be blasted and the flowers won't be blown out nice for Easter." Mrs. Haskins smiled at Sara and Sara smiled eager, bright gratitude in return.

"Sara's going to have the nicest callas for Easter this year she ever had," Mrs. Haskins continued. "I don't know as I ever see such buds. Take the ladies into the flower-room and let 'em see your plants, Sara."

"Yes, do come," Sara said cordially. "Right this way. Be careful of the step."

She opened the door into a narrow passage and led the way toward the further end. The Haskins dwelling was a dilapidated, disjointed affair, in reality three old fishing-shacks joined together by covered passageways. The Haskins had originally lived in only one of the shacks, but as the family grew and the two adjoining shacks were abandoned, the late Mr. Haskins, Sara's brother, had thriftily taken advantage of circumstances and had added the two shacks to his own. The architectural effect was rather that of a ragged pile of storm-blackened drift-wood washed up among the dunes. At one time the greater part of the population of this stretch of beach had occupied just such fishing-shacks, but now real houses had sprung up further inland along "the street" and only a few of the less prosperous families still were living on the dunes.

The Haskins family was not so large as it had been. Mr. Haskins had died, the eldest boy and two of the girls were doing well in the city. There were only Mrs. Haskins, her sister-in-law Sara, and the three younger children at home. So it was that Sara could have a room especially for her plants. The Haskinses called it "the flower-room."

SARA flung open the door of the flower-room with an air. "Step right in, ladies," she invited.

Amelia Stone, Mrs. Gregg and Mrs. Baxter Henry filed into the room, followed by Mrs. Haskins. Coming from the dark chill of the passage-way, it was like suddenly stepping full into the heart of summer to enter the flower-room. The air was warm and sweet with perfume, plants were massed on tables and benches, making a very bower of green starred over with blossoms. Though one could see from the windows a leaden stretch of sand and great angry gray waves sending jets of spray against a gray sky, it was hard to believe that the sun was not shining, the flower-room was so bright and cheery. Even the ever-present roar of the ocean was muffled here and softened like something far-off and of no consequence. This was a little kingdom of isolated beauty, and Sara Haskins was its ruler. She faced her callers triumphantly, something regal in the lift of her head.

Mrs. Gregg and Mrs. Baxter Henry looked around them in surprise. Amelia Stone's face took on an expression of inscrutable stolidity. Mrs. Henry, meeting her eyes, gave an imperative lift to her brows and pursed her lips significantly. Amelia took a step forward, clearing her throat as though about to speak, but Sara interrupted her.

"And here are my callas," she said with an air of conferring a very rare and special favor. She limped to a corner of the room. Her sharp little face shone with a high white pride. Her hands trembled as she turned the flower-pots and parted the leaves that her callers might see the forming buds. "There," she breathed in an awed whisper; "there, do you see?"

The women leaned forward. Amelia Stone's face quivered and grew dark, her eyes were hard, her hands clasped and unclasped as though she could

"You know yourself that you haven't any real Easter lilies, Sara," Mrs. Henry said in her decisive voice. "And all the churches has the real thing now-a-days. You've only got callas." The atmosphere was tense.

Still Sara said nothing.

"Now don't you go to feeling bad about it, Sara," little Mrs. Gregg patted Sara's arm anxiously.

Sara jerked her arm away. She drew herself up, her body quivering with emotion. "Feeling bad!" she laughed scornfully. "Feeling bad! How did you think I'd feel? How do you think you'd feel, I'd like to know? Suppose you was a lame-old maid that never had much of anything nor could go much of anywhere, that never counted for anything in the world one way or 'nother except for her flowers. Suppose you worked and prayed over your flowers all the year and loved 'em into growing leaf by leaf, bud by bud, blossom by blossom so they would be fit in beauty to place in the Lord's house on an Easter day! Suppose that got to seem the biggest reason for you to be alive, as though the Lord said, 'I need you, Sara Haskins, to grow flowers for Easter because there isn't anybody can do it quite so good.' And then suppose a committee come along and said, 'You needn't to trouble yourself no more, Sara, we don't want your homely old flowers; we're going to get stylish boughten ones from the city.' How would you feel then, I'd like to know?"

The women stared. They had not expected anything like this from quiet, inconspicuous little Sara Haskins. Even her sister-in-law had never before seen her so aroused.

"I always wanted to amount to something," Sara went on in her small, fierce voice. "The girls that went to school with me—one got to be a singer and folks flocked to hear her, some got husbands and children and homes of their own to be proud of. Anna Miller, she's a good cook that everybody praises, 'Melie Stone,'—Amelia flinched at the wave of Sara's hand—"she's got money and a hired girl and the nicest house on 'the street.' But it seemed like I didn't have anything and my lameness, besides, for folks to stare at. And then I got to growing flowers, and I could grow 'em better'n anybody else. Easter Sundays I'd set in church and see folks looking at 'em and I'd think 'I grew those flowers everybody's looking at'. And then folks 'ud stop after service and shake hands with me and ask how I ever grew such beautiful flowers and what I put in the dirt and wouldn't I give them a slip of this or that. And now you say you don't want my flowers any more. And I know why, too," Sara looked straight at Amelia Stone. "It's because 'Melie Stone's jealousy of me. Yes, she's jealous. She has a fine house and

"Don't let us talk about it any more, Hattie," she said. "It's gone too deep for me to talk about" scarcely keep from snatching at the buds. Mrs. Baxter Henry looked at her and smiled a secretive, satiric smile.

"Always alike this," Sara whispered. "Always the mystery, the miracle. The miracle that they should be in full bloom for Easter. For fifteen years now, always in full bloom to place in the Lord's house on Easter day."

A little silence followed her wondering voice. Then Mrs. Baxter Henry said, "Ahem!" and nudged Amelia Stone. Mrs. Gregg looked frightened. A gleam went over Amelia's face, she moistened her lips and began, "Sara, we come here today as a committee."

Sara's hands dropped from the flower-pot she had been turning. She braced herself against the table. She looked very fair and frail and mystified as she stood there. Her eyes went swiftly from one to the other of her callers.

"We come here today as a committee," Amelia repeated pompously; "the Easter decoratin' committee. It has been decided that this year, you living so far out and we having to borrow somebody's horse and wagon to cart 'em in, that we won't put you to the trouble of lendin' your flowers for the services as usual. It has been decided to order some real Easter lilies from the city."

Sara stared at her blankly. Then she glanced at her sister-in-law, her eyelids flickering, her face white and helpless.

money and a hired girl, she has a glassed-in flower-room with sprinklers and everything but she can't grow flowers! Not with all her money and fine things can she grow flowers. Oh, I've seen 'em when I've been passing; poor sickly, spindling things with a blasted blossom or two! I've seen 'em, I've seen 'em!"

SARA paused for want of breath. She was trembling with defiance. Amelia Stone's cheeks were purple. She stared at Sara, ludicrously helpless and inarticulate. Mrs. Gregg glanced in distress from one to the other. Mrs. Haskins' head was high, her lips had moved noiselessly in approving concert with every word Sara had uttered. Mrs. Baxter Henry alone, remained smiling and unmoved. Now she stepped toward the door. "Well, ladies," she said to her companions in a pleasant "company" voice. "don't you think it's time we were going?"

The hot color flashed across Sara's face. "Don't be in a hurry," she murmured sarcastically.

"We haven't been," Mrs. Henry assured her sweetly. "Good-afternoon, Sara. Good-afternoon, Mis' Haskins."

With Mrs. Henry in the lead the three women filed along the passage-way, traversed the kitchen and went out on the dunes.

The instant the door closed upon them Mrs. Haskins' indignation broke forth in a shrill torrent. But

The New Administration

THERE has been a great deal of discussion during the last few weeks concerning President Harding's Cabinet. Much of this has been of a purely political character, an aspect of the case which does not interest us, as the Christian Herald is in no sense a political journal. It has always tried to take the broader view, and to search out the things that related to the moral and spiritual, as well as the material welfare of the nation. We believe that our new Executive and those whom he has chosen as official advisors are men of character and experience. Some of them have already shown themselves, by service in various public capacities, to be strong, earnest and efficient in a remarkable degree. Others have yet to demonstrate their qualities; but on the whole, the Cabinet is one that gives promise of good work.

This is fortunate, for there are many big problems that will demand their attention and test their abilities. Among the great tasks calling for wise and prompt action are, first and foremost, "World Peace." This nation looks to the new Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, in the confident hope that he will find a way out of the present anomalous situation, which has detached the United States for many months from doing its share in making the world "a better place to live in." How this is to be accomplished, whether through a League of Nations or a new organization, is certain to call for the utmost skill and the wisest statesmanship. This nation can not forget the high purpose we had clearly in view on entering the war, nor that the first impulse toward world-peace was wholly American. We must regain our lost prestige and international leadership. And we must be prepared to make sacrifices, if need be, to that end.

Disarmament, or the reduction of land and naval forces by the leading countries, is another urgent problem. We should be ready to consider proposals, or even to take the initiative boldly, acting in accord with the great nations, as we believe they are prepared to do. A satisfactory agreement would be an immense relief to all concerned, and a long step towards the assurance of World Peace.

Many purely domestic problems are also to be classed as urgent, but we need not enumerate them. They are, however, vital to the public welfare. Nor should we forget that our wounded and crippled soldiers who suffered in the war, ought to be the subject of early relief legislation. The country owes them a debt which should not be overlooked, and which has already been too long delayed.

The Christian Herald and its readers believe that President Harding and his Cabinet have an opportunity to win the appreciation of the whole nation by acting wisely and promptly on the important questions to come before them. We earnestly trust that they may make a good beginning, and that their course may be marked by the highest motives and inspired by the true Source of all wisdom. They enter upon their duties with the best wishes of a united people.

The Public Strike

OF COURSE everyone knows about the printers' strike, and the switchmen's strike, and the coal miners' strike, and the teamsters' strike, and the steel men's strike and a hundred other strikes, but now it is the turn of the public strike. Old Man Ultimate Consumer has reached the limit of his expenditures, and has gone on a strike. And that is one reason along with some others, for the condition of the industrial world all over the world today.

Take the railroads for an example. Their earnings have been going down on account of a decline in traffic. The traffic has gone down on account of high rates. The high rates were put in to make high wages. Then Old Man Ultimate Consumer—who is always, like the innocent bystander, the one to get hit in a fight between capital and labor—decided he would not send his goods by freight, but hire a truck, or hold on to his goods until the freight went down. For example, the rate on a carload of sand on one of the railroads in 1918, carried the distance of less than a mile, was $7 per 100,000-pound car. Today the same load carried the same distance is $23. The result is that Old Man Ultimate Consumer, who in this case is a builder and contractor, is having the sand hauled by team, and the railroad has lost his trade.

Another case is that of Old Man Ultimate Consumer who is a farmer in Kansas. He lately shipped a carload of extra fine hay from his farm to St. Louis, and when the final settlement was made between him and the St. Louis buyer, the farmer received a $1 bill. The freight bill consumed the rest. The distance the hay was hauled was 400 miles. If any one doubts this statement and thinks it is a freak of the storyteller's imagination, the editor can give the actual facts as recorded in the Interstate Commerce Commission's office.

Yes, Old Man Ultimate Consumer is on a strike. He is not buying as he did. He is not riding around as he did. He is not selling as he did. He is cutting out some of the luxuries and a few of the necessities. Those of him who are wage-earners still want the same high wages as they have been getting. Those of him who are paying wages want to reduce, and in a failure to reduce wages, they are reducing the number employed.

It's a queer world, my masters! Old Man Ultimate Consumer is doing a lot of thinking these days. Wonder how many of him ever think that obedience to the Golden Rule would settle all these troubles. Doesn't it strike you as queer that when we have a remedy for hard times, we don't have sense enough to use it?

Lest We Forget

THERE is a tradition of the earlier ages which tells of a race of men, or possibly the intermingling of several races, who dwelt in the morning of the world in a beautiful land to the south of Palestine. After attaining a certain stage of civilization they became completely given over to gross idolatry and sin in many forms, and ultimately grew so besotted that they ceased to recognize the existence of a divine Being. They literally "forgot God." All warnings—for there must have been here and there a strong voice lifted in remonstrance or admonition—were spurned, and the carnival of indulgence and wickedness seized rulers and people alike. The tradition tells us how divine justice punished them by turning them into beasts; their land became a waste; their orchards bore fruit that turned to ashes on the lips, and at last the population died out altogether.

Faith

By JOHN R. MORELAND

*IN EVERY leaf that crowds the plain,
In every violet 'neath the hill,
In every golden daffodil . . .
I see the risen Lord again!*

*In each arbutus flower I see
A faith that lived through frost and snow,
And in the birds that northward go,
A guiding Hand's revealed to me.*

*Lo! winter from her dark abyss
Came forth to kill all lovely things,
'Twas vain, Spring rose on emerald wings,
Moth-like, from her dead chrysalis.*

*Each germ within the tiny seed,
Throws off the husk that to it clings,
And toward the sun it upward brings
New life to blossom to its need.*

*Ye hearts that mourn, rise up and sing!
Death hath no power to hold his prey;
The grave is only where we lay
The Soul for its Eternal Spring!*

*In every leaf that crowds the plain,
In every violet 'neath the hill,
In every golden daffodil . . .*

I SEE THE RISEN LORD AGAIN!

Such is the tradition, but it is not without its parallels to some extent in the history of great nations that have fallen into sin, and persisted in their evil courses, against conscience and the warnings of their prophets.

We need the voice of a prophet in these days in which we are now living, to arouse the consciences of men and to bring them back to the recognition of what they owe to religion. In these times of social turmoil and excessive indulgence, it sometimes seems that many of us are forgetting God. We need not enumerate here the social perils that beset us, the neglect of public worship, the decline of the home altar and the giving over of the best years of youth to associations that are a poor preparation for the more serious duties of life. Assuredly we have no need to look abroad for illustrations of this kind; they are here, at hand everywhere. Our older folks, or at least many of them, deeply lament the existence of such conditions, but seem powerless to check them. The time has come for the united Church to exert the influence that is needed to bring back the people to a safe spiritual anchorage.

Some of our contemporaries, in discussing the situation, view it as one that is inevitable after a great war such as we have lately passed through. Doubtless this is true in part, as war invariably leaves tumult and disorder, if not spiritual deterioration, in its wake. The law is dealing with a strong hand with various kinds of offenders, but the majority are beyond its reach. What else save the Gospel boldly preached, and the consequences of sins of indulgence fearlessly proclaimed, can meet the needs of the hour? While we can not make men and women moral by statutory enactment, the voices of our preachers and evangelists need to be lifted to warn of the dangers that lie ahead. There never was a time when a revival was so sorely needed as now, to call the people back to God, back to His Church, back to the sane and conscientious performance of duties too long neglected.

Missions and Education

IT IS a fact well worth remembering that wherever Christian missions have been established, they have been followed by an educational system which is now bearing fruit. In India, China and other mission fields a widespread educational work, founded by our missionaries, is now carried on over a steadily increasing radius, with the hearty co-operation of the natives themselves, who have learned to appreciate the benefits the missions confer.

In China, we are told by the Educational Review published in Shanghai by the Christian Educational Association, there are something over 100,000 schools in operation, those founded by the missions not competing but co-operating with the government schools. China, however, is a vast country, with its 400,000,000 population (a native estimate made two years ago placed the figures at 448,000,000), and it needs a million schools to deal properly with child education. One of the leading public-spirited Chinese, Chen Chia Kang, recently gave $15,000,000 to be expended in founding a university in Amoy and providing primary, middle and normal schools and teachers. This benefactor has publicly stated that he was influenced in making his gift by the good work done in the mission schools. Other native philanthropists have founded industrial schools at which both boys and girls are taught trades, so that in the next generation we may expect a notable industrial development in the Oriental republic. This also will be due primarily to the influence and example of our mission schools.

One of the most cheering features of educational development in the Far East is that the schools, in every instance, further the spiritual aims that are the fundamental basis of all missionary enterprise. Christianity thus makes headway by virtue of the reforms it has introduced, and the missionary spirit is discernible everywhere. With all our educational advantages here at home, we may learn still something from those distant fields in this respect. Over there they are becoming specially solicitous in the care of and early training of the young. They are learning to shepherd the lambs. Readers of the Christian Herald, who have been friends and supporters of missions for a generation, helping to found many that have accomplished great results, must surely regard themselves as well repaid for all their self-sacrifice and loving interest in those early struggles.

The World News of the Week

Allies Reject German Offer and Serve Ultimatum

GERMANY'S counter proposals for the payment of indemnities, presented to the London conference, were rejected abruptly by the Allied Supreme Council, which at once took up with its military and economic experts the discussion of practical measures to enforce its demands upon the Germans.

The German offer, in brief, was that the reparations total should be fixed at 50,000,000,000 gold marks, from which there would be a deduction of 20,000,000,000 gold marks at which the Germans estimated the value of the payments already made. This would leave only 30,000,000,000 gold marks, or $7,500,000,000, to be paid by Germany, of which $2,000,000,000 would be raised by an international loan free of income tax. Even this offer was made conditional on Germany's retention of Upper Silesia, the disposition of which is to be determined by a plebiscite, and her restoration to free commercial privileges throughout the world. Dr. Simons, the German foreign minister and spokesman, tried to show that this offer was not far removed from the present value of the Paris agreement for an indemnity of $56,000,000,000—a contention which was rejected flatly.

The Allied representatives conferred a few moments over the German offer and then Premier Lloyd George announced: "The German Government appears to have a complete misunderstanding of the realities of the situation, and the Allies have already agreed that the German proposal is one they cannot examine or discuss as an alternative to the Paris proposal." This ended the session and was followed by the summons to the Allied experts for a discussion of coercive steps.

After a day spent in outlining such steps the Germans again were called into conference and were told Germany would have four days in which to accept the fundamental conditions laid down at Paris—or to submit new reparations proposals of such a nature as to be worthy of the consideration of the Allies. In case of a German refusal, the Allies threatened to take immediate steps: First, the occupation by Allied troops of Duisburg, Duesseldorf and Ruhrort and of the Ruhr region; second, each Allied country to place on German merchandise such a tax as it may deem proper; third, a customs boundary to be established along the Rhine under Allied control.

The Germans replied that the intentions of the German Government had been entirely misunderstood and promised an answer within the required time. As this is written, the ultimatum had not expired and in the meanwhile the Allied Council was busying itself with further discussions of the revision of the Turkish treaty.

League Answers American Protest

THE Council of the League of Nations, in its reply to the American protest against the settlement of mandates without the Washington government being consulted, disclaimed responsibility for the inclusion among the Japanese mandates of the island of Yap, to which the United States objected in particular. It called attention to the fact that the allocation of the Class C mandates, covering the German islands in the Pacific, was made by the Allied Supreme Council and declared the League was concerned only with the administration of the territories involved.

The reply was cordial in tone, stating that no country was likely to challenge the rights which the United States acquired as one of the chief participants in the war, and inviting America to send a representative to the meeting of the Council in May or June, when final action is to be taken on other classes of mandates, including that for Mesopotamia.

The Council referred Secretary Colby's note to the Great Powers and it was considered probable that the question of Yap, which is important to the United States as a link in the Pacific cable communications, would be the subject of direct negotiations between the United States and Japan. Viscount Ishii, Japan's representative in the League Council, expressed the belief it would be possible for the two nations to agree on a compromise, but it was evident the Japanese would object to surrendering the island. They evidently hoped for a convention under which Japan would guarantee the liberty of the use of the cables while controlling the island. Diplomats in Paris suggested that Japan might seek to trade her rights in Yap for concessions for Japanese in Southern Pacific islands awarded to Australia and New Zealand.

Lever Act Penalties Held Void

HUNDREDS of indictments charging profiteering must be dropped as the result of a decision by the United States Supreme Court that the sections of the Lever Act punishing profiteering are invalid because they did not specify sufficiently the nature of the crime. Chief Justice White, in reading the decision, said the wording of the law "forbids no specific or definite act" and is so vague and indefinite, so far as penalties are concerned, that an attempt to enforce such sections would be equivalent to an effort to carry out a statute which merely punished all acts detrimental to the public interest when unjust in the opinion of a court and jury.

Fines aggregating millions of dollars have been imposed under Lever Act convictions, but in a majority of cases payment was held up by appeals. Many large fines have been paid, however, and these must be remitted. Numerous jail sentences also were upset by the decision, the persons convicted having obtained their release on bail pending appeals.

Another important decision of the Court was that upholding the right of the Federal Government to exempt from taxation the bonds of the farm loan banking system. The bonds have been marketable only at prices much below par because of the attack on this right begun a year ago, and Congress had been preparing to aid the banks by appropriating $200,000,000 for their support. The Court upheld fully the power of Congress to establish such a banking system, and to make its securities tax exempt. Officials of the Farm Loan Board announced it would issue at once new bonds with which to finance loans aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars, already approved but held up awaiting the Court's decision. The way now is open for the Farm Loan Board to carry out constructive policies for the agricultural interests of the nation.

Champ Clark Dies

CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House of Representatives during four Congresses and in 1912 Woodrow Wilson's chief rival for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, died at his home in Washington at the age of seventy, after an illness of two weeks, due to a general breakdown. Mr. Clark died in harness and his last coherent words, uttered while unconscious, showed that his mind was reverting to the days when he was Speaker. The end came three days before he was to return to private life, the Republican landslide of last fall having brought about his defeat, after twenty-four years of continuous service in the House.

A college president at the age of twenty-two, Mr. Clark had been in public life almost continuously since 1878. The climax of his career came in 1912 when, after service as Speaker, he obtained a clear majority on eight ballots at the Baltimore convention, but was unable to obtain the necessary two-thirds because of William J. Bryan's attack on him. He retained great influence in the House to the last and was the unanimous choice of his party for Speaker after the Republicans regained control, serving as minority leader in the last session.

A public funeral was held in the Hall of Representatives, the first since that of Sereno E. Payne, in 1914, and burial was at his home at Bowling Green, Mo.

New Anti-Trust Actions Started

SEVENTY-FOUR large corporations, composing what Federal officials term the "Portland Cement trust," and forty individuals who are officers of these corporations were indicted by the Federal grand jury in New York on charges of violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The indictment was an outgrowth of the disclosures made by the Lockwood committee in New York regarding conditions in the buildings trades and followed an exhaustive secret investigation.

One of the two counts in the indictment charged restraint of trade and the other monopolies and attempts to monopolize. The government charged that a nation-wide combination, with a total capitalization of $600,000,000; was brought about through the activities of the six dominant cement companies, whose strength was so great they were able to persuade or coerce the other cement companies to join them. It was declared the combination has so effectually maintained uniformity of price, divided territories, limited output and regulated the sales and uses of cement as to control the cement up to the time it is actually employed in construction work.

Federal officials said the building industry always was kept "cement hungry," as sales were limited to the amount actually to be used on a job, and increases of cement prices never were impeded by surplus supplies of cement on the market. They predicted a successful prosecution of the cement case would be a great contribution toward bringing about a wholesale increase of activity in the construction industry, which uses cement almost as extensively as iron and lumber.

Another Sherman Act prosecution was that started at Indianapolis, where an indictment in five counts, charging conspiracy to violate the act, was reported against 226 bituminous coal operators, coal operators' association, coal mining companies and coal miners.

Panama and Costa Rica Clash

ATINY and informal war, but one in which the United States has a close interest, has broken out between Costa Rica and Panama over the possession of the Coto district, a small tract of little value near the Pacific frontier. Coto was awarded to Costa Rica under an arbitration decision given by Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court, but Panama had retained possession of the district, and Costa Rica brought the question to a crisis by sending troops to seize the territory, which has been in dispute for many years. Panaman troops hastily marched against the Costa Ricans, captured them after a skirmish in which there were few casualties, and recaptured Coto. Costa Rica despatched reinforcements and there were fresh clashes, without any formal declarations of war, but with each country preparing for battle.

The United States sent notes to both governments.

Witnesses to the Resurrection

An Easter Sermon by DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

TEXT—John 1:4. "In Him Was Life."

(In this Day Vision of what the Resurrection has meant to humanity, the attempt has been made to have those persons or Ages speak who have been affected by it. It may give us some small glimpse of the power of the Resurrection in history to hear these various voices from all over the world, and from every race and tongue, speak of the glorious fact of immortality as it shines out in Him who was the "Life of the World.")

JESUS Himself Speaks: "I am the Resurrection and the Life. He who believes in Me, even if he has died, he shall live; and every one who is living and is a believer in Me shall never, never die." . . . "In my Father's house are many resting places. Were it otherwise, I would have told you. For I am going to make ready a place for you." . . . "I came from the Father and have come into the world. Again I am leaving the world and am going to the Father." . . . "Father, do Thou glorify Me in Thine own presence, with the glory that I had with Thee in Thy presence before the world existed." . . . "Glorify the Son, that the Son may glorify Thee. Even as Thou hast given Him authority over all mankind, so that on all whom Thou hast given Him, He may bestow the life of the Ages." . . . "Take this message to my Brethren. I am ascending to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." . . . "And lo I am with you always, even to the end of the Ages."

The Dying Robber Speaks. That day, when I hung on that cross, dirty, bloody, brutal and sinful, through my tortured mind went only one thought—that it might soon be over. I had seen men like myself hang on the cross for several days. I looked forward to the same horrible fate. I had no hope of anything to follow, unless it might be the tortures of the underworld which was the hell reserved for men like me. I had never been taught much about the love or mercy of God. I had spent my life in sin. I was a professional robber. As I hung there, dirty, bloody, brutal, sinful, the most beautiful Face in all the world turned towards mine. And the best that was in me, that which even my sinful life had not been able to crush out, cried out as He looked at me, and I said, "Jesus, remember me when you come into your Kingdom!" And then, to my bewilderment, and like a flood of forgiveness over my sinful life His voice came over to me as I hung there: "I tell you in solemn truth that this very day you shall be with me in Paradise!" Think what all that has meant to me after all this time since those words have been spoken! All the joy of immortality, the wonder of it, the unmeasured glory of it! I could not make it known with any language so that mortal could understand. Only when all who are redeemed by the same mercy shown to me, a penitent sinner, are living in this paradise where I have lived, will they be able to comprehend the power of the Resurrection! In Him was life! And I never died. Only my body perished on the cross. My spirit is alive and will always live! Truly, in Him was life!

The Women Speak: We came that morning after the Crucifixion, to the tomb to anoint the body of our Lord. Our hearts were heavy within us. Our gracious Lord had been killed by His enemies, and His beautiful life was ended. But when we came to the tomb in the early morning, we were amazed and terrified to see, sitting on the great stone which had been rolled back, an angel. His appearance was like lightning, and his garments were white as the snow on Mount Hermon. We were turning to flee, when the angel said, "Dismiss your fears. I know that it is Jesus you are looking for—the crucified One. He is not here. He has come back to life as He foretold. Come and see the place where He lay. And go quick—know what immortality means. Surely, in Him was life!

The Disciples Speak: As soon as the women had told us of the wonderful fact of Jesus being alive, we hurried into Galilee. Already Peter and John, who had been to the tomb and found it empty, had gone up there and were waiting about the shore of the Lake for the Master. Shall we ever forget, those of us who were out fishing that night, when we saw Him standing on the beach in the early morning light! What amazement, although He had told us He would live again. Peter could not wait. He jumped into the water to meet the Master, and the rest of us followed in the little boat. How like the Master to ask us to eat breakfast before He gave us His last commands! Then with what tenderness He told Peter, without a word of rebuke for his denial, to feed the sheep and the lambs! For all eternity we shall not forget that scene on the beach that morning. Then after some days the Master took us with other disciples up into the Mount, and after telling us to go and make disciples of all the nations, He ascended into heaven. Those of us who knew Him in the flesh on earth, now know Him in His glory here in heaven. What glory, unspeakable! No tongue can describe it: Only the redeemed, when they come into the place prepared by Him, will understand it. But we are witnesses that the Lord did rise from the dead. It was that great fact that made Peter's preaching on the Day of Pentecost all powerful. It was that fact that converted the powerful Roman Empire to Christianity. Surely in Him was life!

The Great Apostle Speaks: I am that one who persecuted and put to death the disciples of Jesus. I was exceeding mad against them. But one day as I was on my way to Damascus to arrest Christians, I saw a great light on the road, and Jesus Himself appeared to me in glory. O what an experience for one who had persecuted Him! For several days I was blind. Then, after my sight was restored, I became as enthusiastic a lover of Jesus as I had been a hater of His disciples.

All the world knows my story. Up and down across Asia and into Rome, and even as far as Spain, I went establishing churches. Mine was the earthly joy of preaching the Resurrection and the Life. Without that, my preaching would have been in vain. With it, the Roman Empire itself began to give way. The greatest fact in all history, the living Jesus, after His body had been killed, has been making the most astonishing history ever since. Nothing can separate His disciples from His love. "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!" I said that, while in the flesh. Now that I am at home with my Lord in the realms of His glory, how much more do I realize it! I was martyred in Rome. My body perished in the arena. But my spirit went at once to be with my Lord! Verily, in Him was life!

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus Christ is Risen Today," or "Christ Arose."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Luke, 24: 13-36.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See Page 223, first column.)

Sermon—"WITNESSES TO THE RESURRECTION"—to be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to New York for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Jesus, the Very Thought of Thee," or "O Could I Speak the Matchless Worth."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud: O Divine Redeemer, the Blessing we want is the Blessing we need, if the world is to be better for this gathering. Make us glad, as we go our ways into the common toil or task that each one of us has for his own. And may His grace be all we need to keep us close to His life and imitators of His spirit. We ask it, with joy and faith In Jesus' name. AMEN.

ly and tell His disciples that He has risen from the dead and is going before you into Galilee: There you shall see Him. Remember, I have told you." Then we ran from that place, terrified, but full of unspeakable joy to carry the news. And suddenly as we were running, Jesus Himself met us! It was the same Jesus whom we had entertained as our most honored and revered guest. And He said to us as we clasped His feet and bowed trembling to the ground, "Peace to you! Dismiss all fear. Go and take word to My brethren to go into Galilee, and there they shall see Me." We went to do His bidding. All the world knows that history. We have been living in the unspeakable joys of immortality for all the centuries since then. We see our Lord as we saw Him in Palestine hundreds of years ago; but O how resplendent He is now! What glories surround His presence! Words cannot reveal the wonder and joy of it all. Only until the redeemed shall see what we behold can the children of men

Spiritual Transformation

SUNDAY. Isa. 2:4. "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruninghooks." This is what always takes place when the Kingdom of God has dominion among men. Wherever Jesus reigns, this is one of the fruits of His sovereignty. The sword is converted into a ploughshare, and the spear into a pruning-hook. The sword is not destroyed. It is transformed. The power of the sword is not annihilated; the power remains, but converted. A destructive energy is charged into a beneficent energy. A weapon which has been used for purposes of mutilation is now used in the ministry of cultivation. It is thus that the law of the conservation of forces prevails in the realm of the Spirit.

We may then lay down an axiom in the science of the spiritual life. Jesus Christ never destroys a force; He converts it. He came "not to destroy," but to redeem. Wherever He finds an implement of destruction, He does not annihilate it; He transforms it into an implement of spiritual culture. He retains all the energy of the sword, only it is converted into the energy of the ploughshare. The ploughshare is just the sword transformed, with no particle of its original energy wasted or destroyed.

This is the method of Jesus. When I enter the Kingdom of God, and become a member of the pledged and aspiring host, I pass under the active and liberal influence of grace. I bring with me all the powers which I have been exercising in the ways of the world. I bring with me this or that faculty, possessed of so much power. I bring with me my passion, possessed of so much power. I bring with me my humor, possessed of so much power. How does the work of grace operate upon me? Does the great King denude me of my powers, and do I remain in the world emasculated, with the compass of my being diminished, and the totality of my energies decreased? Jesus Christ our Lord never diminishes our power. Whatever powers I bring to Him, I retain, only I retain them converted and glorified. The "new man" has all the powers of the "old man," but they have been transformed. He takes my swords, and He hands them back to me as ploughshares. He takes my spears, and returns them as pruning-hooks.

Influence

MONDAY. I Kings 15:34. "Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin"—I Kings 11:4. "David, his father." Two men are mentioned here, David and Jeroboam. Both were kings. Both led great groups of people. Both had been dead for about two hundred years when this record was made. Though they were dead, certain things about them persisted. Out from these two lives, as from two distinct springs, had come two contrasting streams of influence. Jeroboam was always used by the chronicler as a standard of badness, and David as a standard of goodness. The evil of one man starting a tendency that was inherited by each succeeding generation till his nation passes out into darkness. The goodness of another man starting a tendency that survives even the slavery of the nation and immortalized in the Messiah. We need to stand and ask ourselves what sort of a tendency we are starting?

The genius of these two long streams of influence was not simply in the men themselves. Jeroboam was not all bad. David was not all good. But their lives were used to link their people to two opposite sets of forces. As the cable car conductor by the grip reaches down to the cable beneath the surface and links the car to power moving in a certain direction, so Jeroboam linked his nation to the forces that moved away from God, while David linked his people to the forces that moved toward God. After both died, the forces still operated.

We, as Christians, need this point. Our influence is not great because we are so powerful, but we have the privilege of using that influence to link others onto the forces of God. This is our greatest privilege. God help us to use it!

A Second-Rate Choice

TUESDAY. Ps. 106:15. "And he gave them their request; but he sent leanness unto their soul." Our best is determined by the choices we make. Before we know it, we often have indulged in something less than the best. We become hypnotized by the world.

The Children of Israel had God as their King. But for the moment they have become tired of God. They started out conscious of God's presence, but they dropped into a lower estate. So we are today in constant danger of making choices that do not represent good at its best. This danger with the Israelites reached a climax when they wanted a king, an earthly king. It was a second-rate choice. However, God did not deny them or abandon them. Generation after generation the very best that was best for them, He gave. But he sent "leanness unto their soul."

This is one of the great tragedies of a Christian's life that, with the opportunity to take the best, he will frequently make a second choice. The best Christians are those who give God their best choice, and in return, receive from Him His best gifts. They are getting the most out of life because they are putting the best into it. A life that pleases God is one that puts Him first and keeps Him there.

The Righteousness of the Nation

WEDNESDAY. Ps. 33:12. "The nation whose God is the Lord." Ours is a Christian republic. It ought not to be necessary to adduce proof of a fact which has been recognized from the beginning of our history until now. The forefathers who founded our institutions were most of them committed to the Christian faith. The laws of our country and its jurisprudence are based upon the Scriptures as the Word of God. Our national and State legislatures are opened with prayer to the Christian's God. We use the Christian calendar. Furthermore, it has been affirmed by national and State enactment, over and over again, that we are a Christian nation. And, it has been so determined by our Supreme Courts.

This should make an end of controversy for loyal citizens. How can that be regarded as an open question, which has been so definitely sealed by the logic of events and by formal adjudication? To deny it is impossible to any loyal citizen, because such a denial would be a blow aimed at the vital sanctions of our national life.

The Supreme Credential

A Lenten Meditation

By REV. W. E. BIEDERWOLF

WHAT wealth of satisfaction in the thought of having been "raised together with Christ" and of thus being "united with Him in the likeness of His Resurrection!" Yes, it is true that Christ's Resurrection was the supreme credential to His own divine being and power; but it was more than that. To us who were "also raised with Him through faith" it is the equally supreme certificate of the reality of the new life and the new power which is ours because of and through Him.

But how evident it is also that the divine thought for you and me has never been that we should rest satisfied alone with the fact of this life, but that, having attained unto it, we shall first of all accept for ourselves the fine obligation such fellowship in the Resurrection implies, and that we shall deliberately fix for ourselves none other than that standard and ideal which even He set for Himself who brought life and resurrection into the world.

Science recognizes what is known as a "balance of life," but such a state of equilibrium is really foreign to organic things save in theory. Where there is life there must be either growth or decay, and who does not recognize the infinite desirability of "increasing more and more" and "growing in grace and in the knowledge of our risen Lord?"

He told us to "consider the lilies of the field, how they grow." It would seem to be Christ's idea that I should become good, just as the lily becomes beautiful; and if my life has failed to become like His, I wonder if it may not be because I have tried to grow in pursuance of some other method than His own. I have resolved over and over again to become good, and then failed at the very point of my resolution, forgetting that the very thing I resolve to become would be the easy and natural outcome if the divine way were mine instead of my own. I have said: "I will copy the virtues of Christ and so by imitation become like Him," forgetting that such an art at its best yields only an artificial product, and that if, instead of imitating the Christ once on earth and now far away in glory, I would allow this same Christ, who by His Spirit dwells in me, to have His unhindered way, He would by His grace work out through my weak but yielded life that which would be fair and lovely like His own.

The lily does not try to grow, and no amount of anxiety or worry or thought will add one cubit to my stature or perfect one grace within my soul. The Christian's life is to be a composed one. Growth really takes place, and if I can say with Paul, "Christ liveth in me," why not just let the Christ-life develop in me? For I am sure if we can learn the lesson of the lily, our life, instead of being a series of dismal disappointments and heart-rending failures, will rise into the beauty of holiness, even as the sweet flower of which we speak rises from the garden of its God into its more than Solomon-like glory.

The Love of Mercy

THURSDAY. Micah 6:8. "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God?" Little Margery Fleming, Sir Walter Scott's precocious child friend, thus sagely commented upon some story of cruelty in the Old Testament: "But not yet had Jesus come to show us the better way." It must be confessed that Old Testament saints were richer in hope and in faith than in love. But let us not be blind to evidences that, beneath the harsh exterior of many an Old Testament saint, there beat a heart of exquisite tenderness. David was a warrior, yet something taught him the secret of the shepherd heart—the heart that pities the weakling lamb, and goes after the wandering sheep.

Long before David sang his songs, the law-giver of Israel had put into the Hebrew code of ethics minute commandments safeguarding the welfare of prisoners, slaves, debtors, the poor, the stranger, the outcast. The widow and orphan were not forgotten. The law declared, substantially, "As ye deal with them, I will deal with you." Christ did indeed organize a "League of Pity," as Dr. Matheson puts it; but for a thousand years the soil of tender hearts had been prepared to receive the seed of His great words. Naught but the grace of God had long before implanted in rare souls the love of love, the hate of hate, the disposition to mercy, the impulse to lowly service.

The Spirit of Reverence

FRIDAY. Heb. 12:28. "Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence . . ." The way to serve God acceptably is with reverence. Gilbert Chesterton, commenting on Ruskin's "Seven Lamps of Architecture," complains that Ruskin was interested in every part of the cathedral except the altar. The true statement is that he found the altar everywhere. Life is daily sanctified by tears and prayers, and by the handing down of the faith of many generations.

It is quite easy for those engaged in religious work to become so inured to sacred things as to lose altogether the sense of sacredness. "The temple mouse is heedless of the temple idol." We need all three of the galleries in the temple which Goethe describes; upon one of them was written: "Reverence for the things that are above us," on the second: "Reverence for the things that are around us," on the third: "Reverence for the things that are below us." Hamilton Wright Mabie told us of a Scotchman who said to him, "Every morning for fifty years I have taken off my bonnet to the beauty of the world." Given God anywhere, you have God everywhere. Let us keep alive the sense of wonder, admiration, awe, reverence. Let us cultivate the "harvest of a quiet eye," the soul receptive and the mind open to the revelations of God, that, like His mercies, are new every morning.

Opening the Gates of Death

SATURDAY. John 11:43. "Lazarus, come forth!" The climax of Christ's miracles was the raising of Lazarus; healing diseases might be explained away, but calling the dead back to life was irrefutable and unexplainable. Many believed on Jesus from that hour, while the chief leaders of the Jews from that day took counsel to put Him to death. That is the only thing for bigots to do, when they can not reply to a great fact. Skeptics of all centuries have wrestled with this miracle, which shows that Jesus is God Himself with full power over death and the grave. What singular words Christ uttered when He first heard of the illness of Lazarus—"I am glad I was not there." He was longing to comfort the bleeding hearts of all future millions with the words, "I am the resurrection and the life. I can open the gates of death and those that hear My voice will come forth." This was unspeakably grander than opening blind eyes and deaf ears. Jesus stood before that grave as the controller of all worlds, forces and kingdoms, and Lazarus' final mission was to return to earth, to show forth the majesty of the Son of God. After he had passed over to the other world, the brother of the Bethany sisters heard the voice: "The Master is here and calleth for thee! Come back to the lowly lintel of your home and dwell awhile amid the shadows."

How You Have Helped China

What the Contributions of Christian Herald Readers Have Accomplished for the Starving

IF READERS of the Christian Herald could be granted a glimpse into the famine regions of North China they would be gratified to observe the manner in which the funds they have contributed for Chinese relief are being distributed.

Under the leadership of the Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee, organized in November to co-operate with existing relief agencies during the famine, the work of feeding the starving, clothing the needy, and healing the sick is going forward with gratifying results.

Reports from the secretary of this committee, H. M. Harris, reaching the office of the Christian Herald, detail the manner in which the money contributed by our readers is being expended and the number of suffering human beings to whom it bears relief.

Prominent in the work which the committee is doing is that, which, by saving the children, looks to China's future. Loans for needy Christian Chinese, food distribution among citizens of all classes, and refugee work among women and children are other important items.

The largest grant in December—$10,000—was made for the relief of women and children refugees at the Canadian Mission at Wu An Hsien, Honan. In the Presbyterian mission at Shunteh, Chihli, $1,100 was granted to supply clothing and shelter for 100 boys; $3,300 for general food distribution; and $1,500 for the 150 girls in the same orphanage.

The channels into which the funds are being directed may be inferred by the following lists of grants, applications for which were considered at the December meeting:

Hsin An Hsien, Honan, for orphanage sustentation	$1,500.00
Hsin An Hsien, Honan, for orphanage work	2,000.00
Loyang, for women's refuge work	3,000.00
Loyang, for famine girls in school	1,000.00
Mienchi, Honan, for famine boys in school	1,000.00
Loyang, Honan, Mr. Anderson, for loans to needy Christians	1,500.00

Definite appropriations were made for the following sums:

Mrs. Clark, Wu An Hsien, for refuge work among women and children	$5,000.00
Miss Peterson, Hsin An Hsien, for orphanage sustentation	1,500.00
Presbyterian Mission, Shunteh-fu for 100 boys	1,100.00
Presbyterian Mission, Shunteh-fu, for food distribution	3,300.00
Presbyterian Mission, Shunteh-fu, for 150 girls	1,500.00
Mrs. Lindbeck, Loyang, Honan, for for women's refuge work	1,500.00
(Agree to appropriate $1,500.00 additional for above purpose if necessary.)
Mrs. Jansen, Loyang, Ho., for poor girls' school	1,000.00
Mr. Beinhoff, Mienchi, Ho., for poor boys' school	1,000.00

At the January meeting of the committee, the list of grants was as follows:

J. W. Boyer, Chinkiang, Kiangsu for conveying and supporting 40 orphans from Tschow, Shantung	$1,000.00
Miss Paula Ritter, Liu Ming Kuan, Chihli, for children and general relief	1,000.00
Miss A. M. Hancock, Kuang Ping Hsien, Chihli, relief work for children	1,000.00
Augustana Synod, for relief work in the counties of Yuchow, Kia Hsien and Juchow, Honan	3,500.00
Swedish Mission in China, the sum of $10,000 allocated as follows:
Starving Christians, Hoanfu, Honan, five months (estimated 205 persons)	831.25
Boys' refuge work at Honanfu, Honan (300 boys)	3,000.00
Starving Christians (Mienchi)	140 adults, 31 children
Thirty families requiring aid later in season	272.00
Women's refuge at Mienchi, Honan	1,000.00
150 adults (Sin An, Honan)	562.50
140 adults (Loing, Honan)	525.00
Women's refuge (Loing, Honan)	1,200.00
Four Mission stations at Shansi, Canadian Presbyterian Mission, Weihsuefu, Honan, for nursing mothers	3,500.00

China Inland Mission, Hwailu, Chihli, for relief work for children	$5,000.00
Honan Famine Relief Committee, for warm garments	5,000.00
Kaifeng, Honan Missions, for women and children	5,000.00
To Rev. Wilson Fielder, Chengchow, Honan, for relief of starving Christians	500.00
To the Free Methodist Mission, Jungtseh, Hsien, Honan, for relief work for women and children in the Hsien of Ho Yin and Jungtseh Honan	100.00

While the efforts of the relief workers have thus made a very favorable beginning, those in the midst of the famine district are impressed with the fact that the end is not yet in sight.

A message of appreciation cabled to Herald readers by the Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee is accompanied by a new appeal, which reads:

"Famine situation desperate. Herald Relief urgently requires million dollars before April. Three dollars from each subscriber saves a life."

HOW fully the American people generally are coming to realize the seriousness of this need is evidenced by the evergrowing list of contributors to Christian Herald Fund and that of the American Committee for China Famine.

Great additional impetus, it is expected, will be given to the movement for Chinese relief by the action of Mrs. Warren G. Harding whose initial act as First Lady of America is to endorse the American housewives' movement for eliminating some article of diet from the family dinner table and giving the money so saved to the preserving of lives in starving China.

In her letter addressed to the American Committee for China Famine Fund, Mrs. Harding announces that she has enlisted in the American housewives' movement, and gives her unqualified endorsement to the nationwide effort of Americans everywhere to help the Chinese by denying themselves some customary article of diet until the famine period is passed. Mrs. Harding writes:

"Information which has come to me concerning famine conditions in China, and also concerning the splendid work your committee is doing for relief of these conditions, moves me to enroll myself among your supporters. I am sure your appeal to American housewives to save in order to help China's unfortunate millions will meet a generous response. We all learned during the war how great a part the patriotic womanhood of the land could play in these intensely practical, necessary affairs. I hope and trust they will now enlist again for this noble cause."

The American housewives' movement, which is now receiving wide support among people of all classes, was started by Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, noted suffragist, and a member of the American Committee for China Famine Fund. Another noted woman who has given her endorsement to the plan, which in general embraces the giving up of one course in each meal or of doing without one meal a week in order to help the Chinese, is Mrs. Maud Park Wood, head of the National League of Women Voters.

THE Christian Herald China Famine Fund is rapidly approaching the half-million-dollar mark. The receipts for last week were as follows:

February 24	$1,417.27
" 25	4,208.17
" 26	1,148.76
" 28	5,144.73
March 1	968.43
" 2	1,243.97
Grand Total	$482,529.13

Contributions may be addressed to the Christian Herald China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

The Living Christ

International Sunday School Lesson for March 27
Matt. 28 : 1-10, 16-20

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THE tomb was sealed by the Roman authorities and a harmony of lies was sought but "He that sitteth in the heavens" laughed at all those plans. The miracle of the resurrection became the supreme seal to the testimony of Jesus Christ and the weekly calendar was remade. The business world, however much the Christ may be denied by individuals, accepts the day named by the church as the weekly anniversary of the resurrection of the body of Jesus. Would that every one who will profit financially by merchandising with reference to Easter could say "My Lord, and my God"!

Again this lesson should be studied with reference to all the facts given in the four gospels. Any class will be profited by making their own interwoven gospel of these events. The appearances of our Lord should be written down in order. The life of a spirit can be talked about and so-called death can be robbed of its gloom.

"Death" is an awful word for many, whereas it is a word that means liberation from earthly limitations. "Death" refers to the human body and not to the spirit. The body experiences the resurrection and the spirit has never ceased to live. The individual, having believed in Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour, is transferred by so-called "death" to another and larger department of service. The spirit of a believer does not go to sleep or cease to be but "to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord." This is truly a wonderful hope with which to comfort one another. Without placing eschatological events in any chronological order it is safe to say that all believers will have similar experiences regardless of personal opinions on the subject. When our resurrection day comes we shall have our glorious body like unto His.

No Judas was present on that first day of the week as the women came early to the garden tomb that they might embalm the body of Jesus. Had he been alive to meet the group he would surely have counted costs as he did only eight days before, when Mary broke her alabaster jar. These women feared and even worried as they came to the place where they expected to find the Roman guard, but their heavenly Father had sent the angels and no stone was there to bother them. Rather the angel was there as a messenger with comfort, instruction and a commission. They could "see" but they must "go quickly and tell."

Women have been wonderfully obedient during the ages since the command was first given. They have been ambassadors of Jesus Christ both at home and abroad. There is special reason for this since womanhood is elevated just in proportion as the facts concerning the death and resurrection of the Saviour are believed. One has but to visit a non-Christian country to see how women are oppressed where Christ is not exalted.

An illustration of this fact was noted last October in riding near Miyanoshta, Japan, when a woman was seen working in a stone quarry with a group of men. On the back of the woman a baby was strapped in the usual Japanese manner and the mother was toiling bearing heavy stones in a basket. As both men and women go and tell of the Risen Lord such things will become impossible. He came not only to save us for heaven but also to make this earth more liveable for all mankind.

THE study of the events of that first Easter reveals many facts of supreme importance to the individual. Three are suggested which bring special joy: Immortality of the soul, stones of difficulty removed long in advance of our footsteps, and gracious forgiveness by our Saviour. With reference to the latter we must remember that when the angel said "Go, tell His disciples," he added "and Peter." We sin as individuals, salvation was accomplished for the individual and as individuals we are forgiven when we sin.

It is a wonderful privilege to bear the message of pardon to one who is guilty. This was the work of the women and it is the continuous work of every saved soul in this twentieth century, though the obligation has been in force since Jesus gave that Great Commission. Saving the world in a generation has often been proclaimed as a possibility. Every reader is urged to take pencil and paper and do a few examples in arithmetic.

A class of boys will be wonderfully interested, kept still and given a life impression by working out the calculation of how many years it would take to win the entire population of the world to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ if every Christian would, by the power of the Holy Spirit, win just one soul to Christ in a whole year. Begin with the suggestion that there is only one Christian in the entire population of the world, over 1,700,000,000. At the end of the first year there would be two Christians. Then those two would each win one, and there would be four at the close of the second year. Each Christian, whether former or new convert, would continue to win ONLY one each 365 days and at the end of ten years there would be 1,004 Christians. But before the 31st year had been concluded the population of the earth would have been saved.

THIS is just a calculation someone will say, yet it calls for only a minimum of work on the part of each and in view of the authoritative command of Christ. This is a business age and another proposition is suggested for serious meditation. Suppose a firm had 500 salesmen in a well organized, well-directed concern and a product to sell which everyone needs. Would not that firm expect each of those 500 salesmen to obtain at least one new customer in the course of a whole year? A church should be a going, growing institution.

Consider every member as a salesman: how many new converts are added annually to the average church of 500 members? Even Sunday-schools do not get pupil for pupil in a whole year. Some Sunday-schools do not increase their roll in twelve months equal to the number of merely their officers and teachers, while there are millions of school age in this country who are not in the Sunday-school, not to mention the adults who should, without any exceptions, be related to the Bible school.

"I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" is the golden text and it is a wonderful promise but it should be studied in its relation to the commands which are found just before it: "Go—Make disciples of all nations, Baptize, Teaching them."

One of the most impressive truths given at the Eighth Convention of the World's Sunday School Association recently held in Tokyo, Japan, was in the pageant presented by Prof. H. Augustine Smith of Boston University, entitled "From Bethlehem to Tokyo." Individuals such as a preacher, children's teacher, teacher of an adult class, etc., each came to the platform and lighted their "light" from the Manger. Then they left the stage but soon they began to return and each came with a group carrying individual "lights." Each group had been found and won by the respective teacher. The great platform was filled with hundreds who had been brought in by means of this individual and personal work. The closing song was indeed triumphant. We today have the same work as the angel which flew in the midst of heaven having the eternal gospel to proclaim.

Welch's Grapelade the pure grape spread

Who wouldn't like it?

GRAPELADE is so much more than a jam or jelly, you know. It has a flavor all its own, with a hint of refreshing Autumn mornings and sunshine and sparkling dew.

Just ripe grapes—the whole grapes, juice and all, go into Grapelade. Only pure sugar is added. Seeds and skins are removed, and acid crystals taken out by our patented process. Grapelade is not a by-product.

As a spread for bread, toast, muffins and griddle cakes, Grapelade is velvety smooth—and rich in flavor. Use it as a sauce for meats, a filling for jelly roll and other pastry. And as a flavoring for desserts, it brings a new idea to cookery. Your grocer has Grapelade in 15 oz. glass jars and 7 oz. tumblers.

The WELCH Lades—pure fruit spreads—include Grapelade, Fruitlade (Grape-Raspberry), Peachlade, Cherrilade, Apple Butter, Plumlade, Strawberrylade, Blackberilade, Currantlade. All in 15 oz. glass jars.

If your grocer cannot supply you, a box of 9 jars of assorted Lades, as above, will be sent securely packed and prepaid on receipt of $4.50 (west of Denver $5.50).

"Because I have heard so many say it"

"My dear Mr. Griffith:

"The story of 'Way Down East' under your matchless direction, is so gracefully portrayed, so wonderfully told, as to be enchanting. It is inspiring in every detail. It must make you quite happy to know that so many men have come away from the picture with the conviction that they must be better men. I tell you this because I have heard so many say it. I wish to thank you in the name of the students of Notre Dame."—(Signed) JOHN C. MCGINN, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Indiana.

And from the lofty Sweetness of St. Mary's

"'Way Down East' is a most wonderful picture. It carries a forceful lesson which, God grant, the men and women of today may heed. By it, may they be induced to live up to the higher and nobler promptings of an exalted nature."—(Signed) SISTER M. CLAUDIA, Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana.

Sermons on "Way Down East"

Rev. Lincoln H. Caswell, pastor of the Crawford Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City, has preached two sermons on "Way Down East."

Rev. Henry R. Rose, pastor of the Church of the Redeemer, Newark (N. J.) recently lectured on D. W. Griffith's "Way Down East," exhibiting more than one hundred and twelve colored scenes from the production.

From Coast to Coast

D. W. Griffith's "Way Down East" now is being shown from Coast to Coast—in First Class Theatres Only—and is playing special engagements at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York City (Seventh Month); Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass. (Seventh Month); Woods Theatre, Chicago, (Sixth Month); Sam S. Shubert Theatre, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Euclid Avenue, Opera House, Cleveland, Ohio; Lyric Theatre, Cincinnati, Ohio; Poli's Theatre, Washington, D. C., and is being greeted in every city as the greatest achievement of all time in the annals of the theatre.

Sara would say nothing. Her lips were closed in a hard, thin line. She sat down by the window and took up the baby-sack she was crocheting. She made twenty-five cents apiece on these baby-sacks. Her hands trembled as she worked, and now and then she drew a deep, convulsive breath as though she had been sobbing. Mrs. Haskins' voice went on and on. "It's all that 'Melia Stone's doing—"

Suddenly Sara lifted an imperious hand for silence. "Don't let's talk about it any more, Hattie," she said. "It's gone too deep for me to talk about." There was a strange quiet dignity about her as she turned again to her work.

The days which followed were very trying for Mrs. Haskins. She dared not say a word to Sara about the Easter flowers. Sara was unapproachably silent and reserved. She looked very frail, and it seemed more painfully difficult than ever for her to walk. She had been accustomed to spend much time in the flower-room working among her plants and singing happily to herself. Now she was there only long enough to water them each morning, and she came limping forth hastily with the hunted, determined look of one who is withstanding some great urge.

ON THE morning before Easter Sunday she quietly fainted as she was washing the dishes.

"This settles it," Mrs. Haskins declared, fanning Sara vigorously as she lay on the old couch. "You've got to stop right where you are Sara Haskins, or you'll be down sick. I'm going to be real sharp with you. I've got no patience with these people that keep their troubles festering in silence. It isn't natural nor good for a person to be as dumb as you've been lately. You've got to talk things right out to me, and then you'll feel better. You've got to rant out your grudge against 'Melia Stone before it grows in on you. It's awful bad for a person to cherish a grudge."

"I don't want to talk about it," Sara asserted feebly. "And I shall cherish my grudge against 'Melia Stone as much as I please. I want to cherish it; I want to cherish it forever. But the flowers don't want me to," she went on in a shaken voice. "Every time I go in there it's as though they said, 'Forgive. Forgive.' I can't hardly stand it to go in there. Flowers are so pure and good. But I don't want to be good, not if it kills me. I'll cherish my grudge against 'Melia Stone to the day of my death."

AT DINNER that noon Sammy the oldest of the three Haskins children, was all excitement over the Easter lilies which he had seen being taken into the church. "Miss Stone was there and Mis' Gregg and Mis' Henry and they kept tellin' the man to be careful. They was great tall plants with long white lilies."

Sara's hand trembled as she lifted her spoonful of tea. She could scarcely eat. Even the tea seemed to choke her.

A heavy fog blew in from the ocean that afternoon. It settled down like a curtain around the Haskins house. One knew that somewhere in that fog the waves were tossing furiously and the life of "the street" went on, but the Haskinses seemed shut into a narrow little world all their own. They chafed at the confinement of it. The children were quarrelsome, Mrs. Haskins impatient. Sara could not work at her crocheting; she kept staring out of the window until it seemed to her that the blank whiteness of the fog was fixed upon her eyeballs and the mournful boom of the fog-horns was the moaning of her own troubled heart.

"I guess it won't be much of a day for Easter tomorrow if this fog don't lift," Mrs. Haskins remarked crossly; "and I don't know as I care much. Have those calla huds come out Sara?" Her voice was sharp almost cruel. Sara's silence irritated her.

"I don't know," said Sara.

"Don't know!"

"I haven't looked."

A Matter

"What, you've been in there waterin' every day and haven't looked at the callas?"

"I shut my eyes. I can manage to stand out against the other flowers somehow, but if I once caught sight of those pure white callas I couldn't hold my grudge. I'd be ashamed to."

"Well, don't hold it then, that's what I say," Mrs. Haskins advised crisply.

Sara's lips stiffened. "You don't know anything about how I feel; I want to hold that grudge. I want to feel hard and wicked."

DARKNESS came early that evening. When Sara sat down by the window after supper she spoke about a rosy glow that seemed to fill the fog in the north.

"It's just the lights from 'the street,'" Mrs. Haskins stated impatiently, "They always show up like that on a foggy night."

"Seems to me this is brighter'n usual—" suddenly Sara paused. "I hear the fire-bell," she said.

Mrs. Haskins and the children rushed to the window. "I declare, it does look like a fire."

"It is a fire!" Sammy asserted shrilly. "Open the window, Ma."

Mrs. Haskins opened the window. The chill fog drifted in and circled about the lighted lamp. The glow in the north was brighter. They could hear the fire-bell plainly now.

"There's a big fire and I'm goin'!" Sammy declared excitedly. He climbed through the window and started off at a run.

"You be careful, Sammy," his mother called. "Don't you get too near!"

"I don't know but it's the depot," she said then to Sara. "Seems in that direction. Lucky it's so damp to-night; things won't be apt to catch. I guess we better shut this window before we get our deaths."

They watched the glow for a long time. Finally it faded, and after a while they saw Sammy coming home.

"'Twas the church, Ma!" he shouted as he burst breathlessly into the kitchen. "The church! Burnt to the ground! They couldn't save a thing! The life-savers come from the point and the whole town was there but they couldn't save nothing! The roof fell in crash k-flop, like that!" Sammy's right fist came down smartly into his left palm. "And the women cried like anything, and the minister was carryin' water in his shirt-sleeves!"

"Well!" Mrs. Haskins breathed. "The church! Just think, Sara, the church burnt to the ground and they just got the new carpet, and had it papered—I guess 'Melia Stone'll feel bad enough. There isn't anybody worked to fix that church up like she has, begging and having sales and entertainments, and now all gone for nothing. I guess she'll feel bad enough."

"Sammy," said Sara sharply. "Did they get out those Easter lilies?"

"No, they was burnt to a crisp. I heard Miss Stone say so. 'Those beautiful boughten Easter lilies all burnt to a crisp!' she said."

A strange expression crossed Sara's face. Mrs. Haskins saw it and whispered, "It seems like a judgment on them, don't it, Sara, the church burnin' with the lilies and all?"

But Sara would say nothing. While Mrs. Haskins and Sammy were still excitedly discussing the fire, she crept off to bed. She could not sleep that night. She kept tossing and turning restlessly.

IT WAS still foggy in the morning. "But I think it'll lift," Mrs. Haskins said as she poured Sara's coffee. "I wonder what they'll do about the Easter services. Sammy's gone to 'the street' to find out. I bet 'Melia Stone and Mis' Gregg and Mis' Baxter Henry feels bad enough; they were going to have things so stylish this year."

In a little while Sammy came in. "They're goin' to have services in the life savin' station," he reported. "Miss Stone and Mis' Gregg and Mis' Henry's gone to the point to see about it."

They're going to roll out the life-boats and set chairs in."

"Well, I don't know but I'll go," Mrs. Haskins said reflectively, "The fire makes things sort of different, don't it, Sara?"

But Sara did not answer. She looked very pale this morning and her eyes had dark rings around them. Suddenly she put her coffee-cup down with a little crash of despair. "I'm going to see if those callas are blossomed," she said in a loud challenging voice. She waited a moment for the expected comment but none came. Then she limped down the passage-way and flung open the door of the flower-room.

There on the table in the corner were her callas, crowned with the purest of pure white blossoms. Sara moved forward with a little rush and knelt down, her arms outspread to enfold the plants.

When she arose her face was strong and serene with purpose. She limped into the passage-way and called Sammy.

"I want you to go over to Sharp's and get Will to bring around the horse and wagon," said she, "and then I want you to help him carry all the plants over to the life-saving station."

"Why, Sara," Mrs. Haskins appeared in the kitchen door, "Taking your flowers over there to have 'Melia Stone turn you down again—"

"Run along, Sammy, fast as you can," said Sara.

She would not listen to Mrs. Haskins. While Sammy was gone she scrubbed the flower-pots.

In a short time Will Sharp appeared with the wagon, and Sara directed the loading. Just before it was done she disappeared and returned in her best brown silk and straw hat.

"I'm goin' right with you," she said.

THE wagon started down the beach, Sara sitting up straight on the seat beside Will Sharp.

"Now stop right here," she directed when they reached the life-saving station. With Sammy's and Will's help she climbed down, and limped into the station. In the big barn-like place Amelia Stone, Mrs. Gregg, and Mrs. Baxter Henry were busy placing chairs.

There was an impressive dignity about little Sara Haskins as she limped toward them.

"I've brought you my flowers for the Easter services," she announced, "You don't need to take 'em if you don't want 'em but I thought you must be feeling awful bad because of the church burning down and having to have the services in this bare place with never an Easter blossom, so I brought them along. And I want you to know that always before I have brought my flowers to the Easter services out of pride and for the sake of the glory they would reflect upon me, but now I offer them to you in all humbleness not because I grew them or I want folks to praise me but because they are beautiful and a fit adornment for the house of the Lord. If you don't want them just say so and I won't hold any grudge against you. I don't hold any grudge now though I tried to. I shall never again hold a grudge against anybody, not so long as there are flowers in the world."

The three women looked at her in embarrassment. Her face was very frank and true and sincere. Amelia Stone was uncomfortably affected by it. "Well, Sara," she said gruffly, "I guess we'd be glad to have the flowers. It'll seem little enough like Easter in this bare place. You can tell the boys to bring 'em in."

Joyously Sara directed the placing of the plants around the improvised pulpit. Her flowers had never been more beautiful. And when the callas were placed even Amelia Stone was moved to express her admiration. "You certainly can grow flowers, Sara," she said with a strained generosity.

"I'll give you slips of any that you want," Sara promised warmly.

In a little while the people trooped in for service. Sara's flowers made a bower of beauty around the pulpit. Such flowers were rare on this stretch of sandy beach. It was hard to grow them in the salt air. The people looked at them with an unconscious, starved expression upon their faces. Many a remembrance of the sermon that morning was confused with the impression of the frail uplifting purity of Sara's callas.

And Sara sitting at the back of the room and looking at her beloved flowers whispered, "Not my beauty, Lord, but thine. I am but thy humble hand-maiden tending the treasure of Thy kingdom."

The minister's voice reached her mingled with the roar of the waves. And through the windows she could see the beach glittering jewel-like in the Easter sunshine.

Young People's Topics-for March 27

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

E. L. and C. E. Mark 16: 1-20.

SEE the B. Y. P. U. topic for March 20, of which this is a continuation. We spoke of Christianity as the exponent of life. The disciples rose to a new life with Jesus Christ. There was an appalling gloom among the disciples over the death of Jesus. It required about fifty days for the risen Lord to gather the little flock together and revive their hopes and dispel their fears. How well the Master wrought this resurrection in the hearts of those who saw Him is shown in the fact that no such reaction followed the ascension, for as Luke tells us, the disciples returned to Jerusalem in obedience to His instructions with great joy and were continually in the temple praising God.

They went everywhere telling the story and Jesus was with them, as He had promised, confirming their word with signs. The resurrection became the doctrine upon which they based their preaching. The resurrection of Jesus was God's validating stamp on everything which Jesus had spoken.

If we are not living an immortal life here how can we believe in an immortal life hereafter? Immortality is a present possession, not a mere future expectation; and the way to be strong in the hope of the future life is to be rich in the life immortal here. Man is immortal for were he not, he would never base his hopes and dreams on immortality.

The Cross in Garo Land

B. Y. P. U. Acts 2: 1-5; Matt. 16: 24; 20: 29

READ "The Garo Wonder Book," by William Carey. Read the pamphlets "The Gospel among the Garos," and "Tura Work among the Garos," to be had from the General Promotion Board of the Northern Baptist Convention, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Garo Land is in the heart of India. The religion of the Garo people is demon-worship. As no demon could be appeased without the shedding of blood sacrifices were continually made. Human sacrifices were most to be desired. Superstition and ignorance made the people like dumb beasts. The first contact these people had with the white race was when the government appointed David Scott as administrator of the whole Brahmaputra Valley. He loved his people, though the mountaineers tried to take his life many times, but he was miraculously saved. It was through Scott that the first government school under missionary supervision was started.

The work is still progressing, but under the most trying difficulties. The cross of Christ, however, shall conquer. There is no field too difficult for the missionary. There are no mountains too high or waters too wide, no conditions too terrible, no people too savage for these intrepid soldiers of the Cross.

The finest dish is a Bubble Grain

Puffed Grains hold supreme place among cereal dainties—as food delights and as scientific foods.

None can imagine cereals more enticing. Here are airy, toasted bubbles—grains flimsy and flavory, puffed to eight times normal size. As fragile as snowflakes—as delicious as toasted nuts.

Millions of children revel in them, morning, noon and night. Sometimes with cream and sugar, sometimes with melted butter, sometimes in a fruit dish, sometimes in bowls of milk.

Prof. Anderson's ideal foods

But Puffed Grains are not mere delights. A scientist invented them for hygienic reasons.

One is whole wheat with every food cell blasted, so digestion is easy and complete. One is whole rice. One is hominy bits—sweet inner corn—toasted and exploded.

The grains are sealed in guns. An hour of fearful heat is then applied. Then the guns are shot, the steam explodes—every food cell is broken.

Thus Puffed Wheat yields whole-wheat nutrition. All elements are utilized. Ordinary cooking at its best leaves most food cells unbroken.

Mothers who ponder these facts are more and more serving grain foods in this ideal form.

Nutty, fluffy pancakes

Now ground Puffed Rice is blended in a perfect pancake mixture. It makes the pancakes fluffy and gives a nut-like taste. These pancakes are the finest ever served. Ask for Puffed Rice Pancake Flour—self-raising.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

New York

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent., are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6 1/2 per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107 1/2 per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent., are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7 1/2 per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co., 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

The Roman Empire Speaks: Ours was the conquering force of the world. Our legions were known all over the then known world. What was this Carpenter, of this obscure province of Judea? At Rome His name was a vague outline of a peasant, Who had been healing a few sick people with magic. Our Procurator, Pilate, allowed the Jews to put Him to death as a common criminal. The execution was carried out and two robbers were crucified the same day by his side. Then, because some of the Jews were afraid that the friends of this peasant, Jesus, would attempt to steal His body away from the tomb where He was buried, Pilate put a special guard of our Roman soldiers around the tomb, which was sealed with a great stone. But something strange happened that night. Just what it was our people never knew. But the soldiers were apparently smitten down by some strange power, and in the morning the body of this peasant was gone. We spread abroad the story that His friends stole the body while our soldiers slept. But somehow the world has not believed that. Wonderful things began to happen. In less than three centuries, the Empire had a Christian emperor. People all over the world began to believe in a very wonderful manner in this peasant of Judea. Something greater than sword and spear and armies began to hold the thought of mankind. That power finally destroyed Rome's power. History says it was faith in a Resurrection. What a power it must be! Verily, in Him was life!

The Reformers Speak: Through the ages we are of those who in spite of dungeon, fire and sword, held up the torch of the risen Lord. Whatever our faults—and we were all human—one thing distinguished all of us—our devotion to the ideals taught by the Master. And among all the faiths we have held in our hearts, the one uppermost has been the faith in immortality, not as proved by science or demonstrated by logic, but our faith in it because Jesus rose from the dead. That one great fact made human progress possible, because that fact made human effort to advance worth while. The race advanced because that advance was part of an eternal progress. At the center of all the real reforms of every age has been the fact of immortality as proved by the resurrection of Jesus. What a wonderful fact! What a source of all progress! Yea, in Him was life!

THE Sick Speak: We are the multitude of those who in every century, in spite of pain and disease and suffering, have been sustained by the faith in a future world which would be free from physical trouble. In our moments of despair we have laid hold on those promises that were based on the resurrection: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were gone—and I heard a loud voice which said,

"God's dwelling-place is among men.
And He will dwell among them,
And they shall be His peoples.
Yes, and God Himself will be among them.
He will wipe every tear from their eyes.
Death shall be no more;
Nor sorrow, nor wail of woe, nor pain;
For the first things have passed away."

These are the sustaining words that kept us from despair, us millions of earth's suffering, holding all of us, who loved the Lord Christ, from the madness of the mind and the terror of the grave. Now, our abode is in that place prepared for us by His love, where perfect health and joy are the lot of all of us who put their trust in Him. Surely, in Him was life!

The Poor Speak: Ever since He said, "The poor have the Good News preached to them," and "Blessed are you poor, for the Kingdom of God is yours," we have not despaired, even when earth's riches were denied us by those who had its luxuries. We recall His gracious words when He stood up in the synagogue and read the words:

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me Because He has anointed me to proclaim good news to the poor."

and we shall never forget that He Himself had not where to lay His head, and although He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor that we through His poverty might become rich. Yet, although we have never believed that poverty was in itself any blessing, and although we believe that the sons of men will sometime reach that place in the earthly life where poverty will be practically unknown, the thing that all through the centuries has kept millions of us who believe in Jesus happier than the rich, has been our faith in immortality as illustrated in His own. Surely this is a faith that has had a most tremendous influence in preserving the happiness and tranquillity of millions of human beings in all history. What else could have performed this miracle? Thanks be to Him for the riches of His grace. Truly, in Him was life!

THE Disappointed Speak: We are of that large number of humans on earth who reared broken columns. Ambition thwarted, love despised, effort wasted, questions never answered, life seemingly not worth having. Then to millions of us after the Resurrection, came the amazing revelation of the possibility of another existence where we might try again to do the things we failed to do, or could not do, or were not allowed to do here. And living on that hope in Him, those of us who trusted in Him as the Eternal Life, now find ourselves in a place where ambition is satisfied, where effort is always rewarded, where love surrounds us like atmosphere, where perfect joy without disappointment crowns our attempt at things that on earth were impossibilities. O all ye disappointed ones of earth, there is another world! It is the world of perfect achievement. It has been made possible by the Resurrection of Jesus. Yes, truly in Him was life!

The Toilers Speak: Ours are the backs that have bent in the earthly life to raise food, to build cities, to dig fuel, to bear burdens of housework, to care ceaselessly for the sick and the sorrowing. And among the millions of us who have put our trust in the risen Lord we have always been sustained so that we could sing a song as we toiled. Even the weariness of earth has been blest by the knowledge that He bore it with Him on His own heart, and ever and always we have heard Him say, "Come unto me and ye shall find rest." Immortality, another world, a place, a resting-place, prepared—the thought has cheered millions of us; and now that we are enjoying that eternal life in heaven we know that our faith was not an empty dream but a glorious fact. What a sustaining faith is this for the toiling sons and daughters of men! Faith in a risen Lord! And a risen humanity! Thanks be to God for that resting-place in the Father's House! In Him was life!

THE Nations Speak: When Jesus was aware of His death by crucifixion, He said, "And I, if I am lifted up from the earth will draw all men to Me." How wonderfully that prophecy has been fulfilled. In all the centuries, men of all nations have felt His drawing power. Millions of them have been redeemed by His forgiving and regenerative power. We are of that great multitude described in the Book of The Revelation where it says—"After this I looked, and a vast host appeared which it was impossible for anyone to count, gathered out of every nation and from all tribes and peoples and languages, standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed in white robes, and carrying palm branches in their hands. In loud voices they were exclaiming, "It is to our God who is seated on the throne, and to the Lamb, that we owe our salvation!" And when one asked who these multitudes were, the answer was, "They are those who have washed their robes white in the blood of the Lamb. They will never again be hungry or thirsty; never again will the sun or any scorching heat trouble them. For the Lamb who is in front of the Throne will be their Shepherd, and will guide them to watersprings of Life, and God will wipe every tear from their eyes." Yes, the glory of immortality is around us! The hatreds and race prejudice that warred on earth have all disappeared in these heavenly places, where all kindred and tribes and tongues live happily together. And the Resurrection is a fact which we share with all the redeemed nations of the earth. Ah! Verily, in Him was life!

The Dead and Dying Speak: We are the great multitude daily, hourly, every minute of recorded time, who are constantly passing on out of the earthly life into the other. A sad and terrible procession it would be, if it were not for the faith of those of us who believe in the Eternal Life as it was in Jesus Christ, the Resurrection and the Life. But as the ages pass along, the terror of death, from whatever cause, is swept away by the knowledge of Life Eternal. As the Master said: "Do not fear those who kill the body, but cannot kill the soul." All of us who loved Him are alive today and happy in Him. Long ago the horror of the plague, the famine, the battle-field, the disease, has been forgotten in the glory of this place where we are. Hallelujah! In Him was life!

THE Church Speaks: Through all the centuries our power has been built up on a living Christ. If He is not alive today and if the Resurrection is not a fact, then is our preaching in vain. The Church is a living witness of the Resurrection. Jesus Himself said that the gates of Hades or Death should not prevail against it. Surely, in Him was life!

O all ye sorrowing, despairing, hopeless, sick, weary, disappointed, poor, toiling, dying, listen to these witnesses to a Risen Lord! The broken column shall some time be finished. The unfinished song shall some time be continued. The broken heart shall be healed. The tear shall be wiped away by God, and the darkness shall be turned to day, for there shall be no night there.

Glory be to the Eternal Presence!
IN HIM WAS LIFE!

Dr. Sheldon's Preaching Tour

THE ministers of Marietta, Ohio, recently persuaded the Editor-in-Chief of the Christian Herald, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, to spend two days in Marietta and he arranged a program as follows:

By REV. W. L. GOLDSMITH
Pastor of the First Congregationalist Church, Marietta, Ohio

church, showing the need of such a ministry. After the singing of a few loved and familiar hymns, followed by prayer. silent and spoken, the speaker, who so recently has himself passed through the deep waters of severe illness, brought forward sane, simple rules of Christian faith and living, which assuredly lead to peace of mind and health of body.

Frankly acknowledging the legitimate use of all remedial agencies, the speaker emphasized the place and power of prayer, especially as an expression of deep and abiding trust in God. At the close of the meeting many accepted the invitation to remain for special prayers on their behalf. All of the ministers have endorsed this meeting without any qualifications, and express their conviction that we need to develop such a ministry in all of our communities.

The Monday evening forum in the City Auditorium was announced as of special interest to industrial groups, but controversial matters were avoided. The address on "The Value of a Human Being" was concluded with an opportunity for questions, and the Christian point of view was clearly shown to be the solution of all strife in the modern world. Humanitarian considerations take rank above all material values. The radical and the conservative must settle their differences in the light of Christ's teaching about the supreme worth of humanity. It will be clear that this also was a religious meeting, and the spirit of earnest prayer prevailed.

For variety of appeal and practical value, this two-day mission has not been surpassed. Evangelistic efforts are frequently entangled in high finance and questionable methods, which antagonize and divide; but in this united effort all objectionable features were absent. The Christian community was drawn into closer fellowship and the public was impressed in a new and vivid way.

The churches uniting in this Two-Day-Plan included the Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Christian, and Episcopal. The meeting on Monday afternoon for the sick was held in the Episcopal church, and Dr. Sheldon spoke from the pulpit, after a warm and very fitting word had been spoken by the Episcopal minister. The Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., President Parsons of Marietta College, and other religious workers also added their presence and hearty sympathy to the various meetings. There was a perfect atmosphere of interdenominational unity of spirit. The Sunday night mass meeting was held in the Baptist church building, and the Monday night meeting in the city Auditorium. The citizens generally, of all faiths, and creeds, attended the different gatherings and deepened the community feeling.

First Mortgages on Corn Belt Farms are known to conservative investors as the highest grade of a standard form of investment. While the normal interest return is 5%, we are able to offer and recommend for immediate purchase some of the choicest mortgages we have ever owned to net 6¼% and 6½%, with interest payable semi-annually. Every mortgage offered is secured by productive farm land worth, exclusive of the value of buildings, at least double the amount of the mortgage, and has been purchased for this bank's own investment after careful investigation and appraisal.

Our circular of February, 8, describes these mortgages, and also contains full information regarding our 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Sent on request by the

The stock of this bank is owned by the stockholders of the First National Bank of Chicago. Combined resources exceed $380,000,000.00.

Equal SAFETY on Either Road But Not Equal Profit

Today you put your money in the savings bank. Tomorrow the savings bank puts that money into safe securities, netting the bank a good interest rate. It pays you 3½% or 4% interest for the use of your money. But—

The bank cannot afford to pay more because, while it invests your money partly in mortgages paying 6 per cent. or more, it also invests a part in low interest-bearing Government or Corporation bonds. Another part of your money the bank keeps as cash on hand to meet the withdrawals of depositors. Furthermore, it has to meet overhead operating expenses. All these things reduce the bank's earnings.

Thousands of folks have learned that instead of depositing in the Savings Bank it is quite as easy, quite as free from worry and annoyance, to place their savings, themselves in 7 per cent. Miller Mortgage Bonds, which are surrounded by strong safeguards similar to those the savings bank demands in securities in which it places its depositors' funds.

Furthermore, in Miller Mortgage Bonds, you are never missing a day's interest. You cannot obtain this feature at any savings bank. Money deposited there before an interest date, is money lying idle until that interest date.

Investigate 7 per cent. Miller Mortgage Bonds. You will find every bond secured by modern, fire-proof, non-speculative, income-earning property in prosperous communities. And the value of every piece of such mortgage property is worth more than twice the amount of bonds issued.

We have prepared an interesting booklet "Creating Good Investments," fully describing the attractive features of Miller Bonds. Call or write today for a copy of this booklet, and ask us to send you the names of people near you who have found how safe and profitable Miller Bonds are—people who are now investing their own money in exactly the same high standard securities as their local bankers approve.

ments, strongly disapproving of the methods employed in the boundary dispute, and exerted its influence to prevent actual war. The American forces in the Canal Zone were strong enough to have suppressed easily the activities of both sides, but intervention would involve many problems and Washington desired to avoid the use of force, since it might arouse ill feeling in other Latin-American countries.

Revolts in Russia Reported

PERSISTENT reports of revolutionary movements in various parts of Russia have come from the Baltic states and have revived hopes that the fall of the Bolshevik government may be not far distant. Such reports have been received so often, however, that the world is inclined to discount them, especially since there is no evidence of unity in the movements and no sign of the appearance of a leader capable of establishing a new government.

The most serious outbreak appeared to be that in Petrograd, where street battles with machine guns occurred after a public meeting of workers. Sailors sent from Kronstadt to restore order joined in the demonstrations and the rioting spread to the suburbs, with mutinies by several units of the Soviet army reported.

Communications from Russia were long delayed and the reports conflicting, one having it that the Petrograd revolt had been quelled by troops brought from the front and another that 300,000 strikers were arrayed against the Soviet forces. The Soviet trade delegation in London denied absolutely that any revolutionary movement was in progress.

The risings were attributed to the desperate food and fuel situation and were laid to involve Moscow and Southern Russia as well as Petrograd.

$13,318,542 SPENT ON ELECTION. Figures disclosed by the report of the special Senate committee on campaign expenditures showed that the two major parties spent a total of $13,318,542 in the 1920 presidential campaign—the Republican total being $10,960,290 and the Democratic $2,358,252. Pre-convention campaigns cost Republican presidential aspirants $2,859,551 and Democrats $120,482.

THIRTY-SEVEN KILLED IN TRAIN WRECK. Thirty-seven persons were killed and one hundred injured when Michigan Central and New York Central trains, both traveling at high speed, crashed at a crossing at Porter, Ind., forty miles east of Chicago. GRAVE DISORDERS IN ITALY. A new epidemic of rioting, verging on civil war, has broken out in Italy and the casualties were numbered by the hundreds. One of the most destructive outbreaks was in Trieste, where 300 armed Communists, in reprisal for the destruction of the Trieste Labor Chamber by Nationalists, seized the great San Marco dockyard, fired it and caused a property loss of $5,000,000.

A Missionary Who Loves Adventure

"SHOW me a schoolmaster who doesn't love his boys, and I will show you one who is no use," says Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, and there you have the key to all of his work among the Labrador fishermen. He loves them and he loves the adventures of sea-faring life.

From the time he was a child his "bent has been for things of the sea." When he started on his first trip to Labrador, nearly thirty years ago, a friend asked him what deep religious emotion enabled him to accept the sacrifices and discomforts of such a venture. To which Dr. Grenfell replied that he had not considered the question of hardships at all.

"On the contrary," he said, "everything about the journey attracts me, and the preparations are an unmitigated delight. I have no lofty motives. I have always believed that the Good Samaritan went across the road to the wounded man just because he wanted to. I don't believe that he felt any sacrifice or sense of fear."

Adventures have always come to Wilfred Grenfell, because he is that sort of person. When the question of life work came up, the boy wanted adventure, and was deeply disappointed when he found that hunting tigers could not be counted upon as a means of support. In the end he decided to become a doctor because the workings of the human body were interesting.

While he was studying medicine, Wilfred Grenfell heard Moody preach and decided that following Christ was the only adventure worth while.

Moody's influence set the boy to working for all he was worth and "made religion real fun—a new field brimming with opportunities."

At first he worked with a class of boys from the London slums, and then the desire for the sea took him to the fishing fleets of the North Sea, and finally to Labrador.

The first summer he was in Labrador Dr. Grenfell treated nine hundred patients, and medical work is still the "main tent" of his mission there, but there are many side shows.

Early in the action he decided that there was no use trying to heal underfed people with pills, so he set out to find ways of curing the poverty which is the cause of rickets and tuberculosis in the north country.

One of his ventures was a chain of co-operative stores where the people might be freed from the barter system which always gave the poor trappers the worst end of the bargain. He also established a sawmill, and experimented with fox-breeding and with the introduction of reindeer into Labrador. He established a children's home, to which some of the youngsters came because they were orphans and some because they were not.

And always he traveled up and down the coast among his people—four thousand miles by boat in one summer—and on into the fall until the decks of the Strathcona were frosted like a Christmas cake. In winter he travels by dog train, or when the going is too bad for that, on foot.

necessary. The negro brought the chair, but Mr. Wilson spurned it, and walked, a distance of a hundred feet, to the Senate elevator that took him to the office of the President on the Senate floor. It required something like twenty minutes for Mr. Wilson to negotiate this distance and twenty-five feet more, after the Senate floor was reached.

In the Presidential office, which must ever remain in Mr. Wilson's memory because of the fact that he took the oath of office there on Sunday, March 4, four years before, the President called for the last-minute bills and resolutions that required his consideration. The bills were brought, and thirty of them were signed before he left the Capitol, still President of the United States, but with his work behind him, others counting the minutes before they would succeed.

AT THE insistence of Mrs. Wilson, who remained with her husband through the trying time at the close of the administration, and Dr. Grayson, for eight years the White House physician, the President consented to go to his new residence in S street before the oath had been administered to Mr. Harding. The President-elect, in fact, joined in the suggestion that Mr. Wilson might not be strong enough to accompany him to the Presidential stand in front of the Capitol, saying that if this were true he would understand and that there need be no feeling that he would consider failure to appear a personal slight.

"Let us leave," said Mr. Wilson, visibly tired after the most strenuous day he had passed in a year and a half.

Silently Mr. Wilson put on his overcoat and, with Mrs. Wilson on his arm, Joseph P. Tumulty, his secretary, close at hand, and others who were near to him throughout his administration at a trail, he passed from the Capitol into private life. When he left he still retained the title of President of the United States but, less than an hour later Mr. Harding, receiving the oath administered by the Chief Justice of the United States, assumed the duties of the office. At the time Mr. Wilson was at lunch with the members of his family at his new residence.

THE ceremonies in the Senate chamber were in progress in the meantime. The oath had been administered to Vice-President Coolidge, and Thomas Riley Marshall, of Indiana, the only man who ever took with good humor his election as Vice-President of the United States, was stepping out of office.

Mr. Harding, at twenty minutes after one o'clock, with the clock being set back continually to make it noon under the Constitution, came on to the inaugural stand. With him was Mr. White, the Chief Justice. Mrs. Harding and other members of the family had come to the stand a few moments before. They were waiting.

As the President-elect came down the steps the Marine Band, in a stand directly in front of that occupied by the dignitaries, struck up a march. The great audience, estimated in size at 100,000, arose, applauded.

Mr. Justice White stepped forward, in the robes of the Supreme Court, and spoke the oath which Mr. Harding repeated, phrase for phrase:

"I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of the President of the United States and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

But Mr. Harding, in fact, bound himself to duty with two oaths of office—that administered under the Constitution and the second his own, at the close of his inaugural address. His hand uplifted to Heaven, he spoke from the Scriptures—

"What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

"This," he added, "I plight to God and country!"

Silence hung over the mighty throng for an instant; then a tremendous shout of approval went up, starting in the sections nearest the inaugural stand, but rolling back and back to the outskirts which fringed the lawn of the majestic Congressional Library half a mile away. With this President Harding bowed his acceptance of the public endorsement, retiring, with modesty to the Capitol.

TO THE public the inauguration had ended, except for the passage of the Presidential party, half an hour later, from the Capitol to the White House. The crowds lined the street again. President Harding, with Mrs. Harding at his side, rode the mile with the cavalry escort, while countless thousands again applauded. The ceremonies had closed at two o'clock and at 2.45 the new President and the members of the family were having their luncheon in the Executive Mansion.

It will be left to the editorial writers to comment on the address of the New President delivered at the inauguration. Opinion will be divided. Certainly there was no departure from the Republican position on national and international affairs as voiced by Mr. Harding during the campaign; certainly those opinions were endorsed in November by a majority which sent Mr. Harding to the White House.

So the big national show came to an end—the show held once in four years to mark the change of engineers in public affairs. It differed in outward display from the inaugurations of previous years, but not in its unbounded importance.

Washington, as a city, did not approve. It regarded the show as a one-horse circus, fallen flat without the customary all-afternoon parade, capable of drawing thousands upon thousands of a spending public to the city of Presidents.

Mr. Harding is in the White House just the same, with four years of work ahead, four important, serious years meaning much to America.

THE example set by the United States in establishing juvenile courts has now been followed by all the principal countries of Europe. Spain, the last to fall in line, has now adopted the modern viewpoint that delinquent children should not be treated as criminals, but rather as victims of adverse conditions and surroundings. In working out the details of the law Spanish authorities followed America's experience.

Under the Spanish law the children's judge is not necessarily a member of the bench. He is assisted by two advisory members appointed by the Commission for the Protection of Children. Privacy is guarded very closely in the Spanish juvenile courts; no one except probation officers is allowed in the court except by special permission, and the press is forbidden to publish any information about cases coming before such courts.

"There's a Reason"

For the CHILD

AN irresistible "age-of-innocence" charm is one of the most delightful features of the Children's Department at McCutcheon's.

Somehow the desired simplicity of the child's wardrobe has here been carefully guarded, while the workmanship itself has lent a distinctiveness that is all the more delightful because unpretentious.

Smocks, frocks, rompers—Oliver Twists—all have a rare individuality, sometimes in handwork, often in daintily contrasting colors—always the materials are of the finest quality.

SUGGESTIONS for Layettes and Infant Outfits with accompanying cost gladly sent upon request.

Questions and Answers

A. G. L., New Hampshire, writes: "I have been greatly interested in the discussion of the Sunday Amusement question, so vital to the interests of the Christian Church. If we take seriously what our liberal minded friends state in regard to this matter, we must infer that the boys and girls of the earlier days were most of all children most miserable, especially on Sunday afternoons. Let me state a bit of personal history. It wasn't the fashion but it was the pleasure for the young people of our neighborhood to gather, to the number of ten or fifteen, on Sunday afternoons at the home of one of their number where there was an instrument, and after a time spent in conversation, some one was escorted to the instrument. A few lively chords, calculated to stimulate the musical pulse of the company, soon brought every one to his feet and the singing began. Not the cheap ragtime stuff of the present day, in which there is neither life nor sense nor music, but those good old Gospel songs and hymns in which there are harmony and pathos and power. In this way the afternoon passed, and at six o'clock we broke up to meet again a little later in one of the churches, where every one took part, at least in the singing. As we sit here in this quiet, rural New Hampshire town, and meditate upon the widespread effort that is going on to break down the Lord's day, I wonder if the young people are, after all, getting any more out of life in these days than we did sixty years ago! And then, again, I wonder if, when the shadows begin to gather about those who are now young and they find time to meditate, they will realize something of what Paul meant when he said: 'Be not deceived: God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that will he also reap.'"

C. T. H., Virginia. 1. The apostles remained in Jerusalem, awaiting the fulfillment of the promise in Acts 1:8, which fulfillment came on the day of Pentecost. 2. There is no records of their ever having been all imprisoned simultaneously. 3. Beyond the Bible account in Genesis and the writings of Josephus, Berosus and a few others who gave the traditional records, there is no authentic source of information concerning the ark. 4. The genealogical lines of descent from Shem, Ham and Japheth can be found in any good Bible encyclopedia.

Interested Reader, Pueblo, Colo. The whole question of Jerusalem and the world war can not yet be dealt with in its relation to prophecy. The present period is regarded as a "time of fulfillment," and students of prophecy are giving it their most serious consideration. Some of the best articles on the subject you will find in the book entitled, "Light on Prophecy," published recently by the Christian Herald.

W. E. L., La Mesa, Calif., writes: "Is it inconsistent to think there was on earth, intelligent animal life in the form of man, long before God breathed the breath of His own life into man, and he, man, became a 'living soul'—a soul that lived in the same sense in which God lived? May not many of the works of prehistoric man, which men of today are uncovering, be the works of those unskilled-of-God animal men. Perhaps the Nephilim of the sixth chapter of Genesis?"

The suggestion is purely speculative, since even the most painstaking, scholarly investigation throws little light on the nephilim. The very meaning of the word is in dispute, some holding that they were giants, and others that they were fallen angels or their descendants, while a third class of investigators holds that there were two kinds of nephilim, the first, the originals (who some writers believe may have been fallen angels), and the second, their progeny (See Gen. 6:1-6) who were living contemporaneously, being a huge, unruly generation, lawless, and having no past to brood over to regret. We get the Bible setting by reading the chapter mentioned. These nephilim, however, were not pre-Adamites. Long before their appearance, man had received "a living soul," and there had been a long line of patriarchs from Adam to Seth. One authority says: "The nephilim, assuming them to be intelligent beings, had been either born in rebellion against God, or had at least grown up in ungodly, lawless ways. It is reasonable to assume that they realized their sin, but were so wholly given over to it that they defied both God and man, and were hopeless. This seems to be conclusively shown in Gen. 4:5 and 6. If they had been mere animals, 'without understanding, as the beasts,' the record in Genesis would have been altogether different. Whatever their origin they were degraded, sin-besotted, and so thoroughly wedded to wickedness that they may be said to have 'forgotten God'—a condition which always points toward ultimate destruction."

Would You Like to Own These Fine Books Without Cost?

THESE successful and worth-while books have been selected from the popular $1.00 copyright series. We are going to give them free of charge to present readers of the Christian Herald who help us to get new readers for the Christian Herald. Read the descriptions of the six books and then read the liberal offer made below.

They are all in fine (5 x 7 ins.) cloth binding and nearly all illustrated

MY HOME IN THE FIELD OF MERCY

By FRANCES WILSON HUARD

This book brings us back to the same chateau described in MY HOME IN THE FIELD OF HONOUR, transformed by loving hands into a war hospital for French wounded, "Annex No. 7." The tale of how Mme. Huard secured funds for maintenance of her hospital and afterwards the picture of life there makes a fitting sequel to the thrilling narrative of the early devastation of this beautiful old home. All of which is breathlessly interesting, and full of fun, in spite of all the danger and the suffering.

MARTHA BY-THE-DAY

By JULIE M. LIPPMANN

Delicately nurtured, but alone in the great city, Claire Lang finds herself one rainy night on a New York street car without even her fare. A big, kindly charwoman (Martha By-the-Day) befriends her and proves to be her good angel.

"The cheeriest, most warm-hearted and humorous character since Mrs. Wiggs."—Living Age.

"A find. No sweeter humor has been written into a book."—Hartford Courant.

PEOPLE LIKE THAT

By KATE LAGLY BOSHER

Author of "Mary Cary," Etc.

To every sort of people other people not of their sort are "people like that." Miss "Danny" of the so-called "upper class" eagerly desires to know all sorts of people—so in spite of the horrified protests of her wealthy friends she takes an apartment at Scarborough Square and becomes involved in the sorrows and joys, tragedies and comedies, that make up the lives of the residents of that dilapidated section of the city.

The author treats a big theme, namely that of a single code of ethics for man and woman, with earnestness and sincerity.

SYLVIA OF THE HILL TOP

By MARGARET R. PIPER

Author of "Sylvia's Experiment."

In this story Sylvia plays the rôle of messenger of joy and cheerfulness of Arden Hill, during her summer vacation. She befriends sick neighbors, helps "run" a tea-room, brings together two lovers who have had differences, serves as the convenient bridesmaid here and the good Samaritan there. There is, of course, a Prince Charming in the background.

SAUL OF TARSUS

By ELIZABETH MILLER

The same splendid imagination that reconstructed the Age of the Pharaohs and revived the glory of Egypt in THE YOKE here plays with lambent flame about the great Roman world. The scenes are laid in Jerusalem, Alexandria, Rome and Damascus. Wonderful descriptions, heart-stirring incidents, deep emotion, high thought and a love story of the purest and noblest type mark this most remarkable religious romance.

MR. OPP

By ALICE HEGAN RICE

Author of "A Romance of Billygoat Hill," Etc.

It is a sunny book, whimsically pathetic, which gives a tug at your heartstrings and an itch to your funny bone, such as few books have done since Dickens' time. Mr. Opp is such a pretentious, absurd, amusing little man, who begins as a commercial traveler and continues as a country editor. He whistles as he goes, such a plucky, sturdy, hopeful whistle as calls to arms the courage that lies slumbering in the hearts of men.

Twenty Splendid Books to Select from

You Never Know Your Luck

By Gilbert Parker

Gilbert Parker has joyously come home to the land he loves best, to America and the open prairies. Because he loves it, all his heart is in this tale of a country where romance is clean and quick, and the blood runs riotously under the flawless sky, with fresh winds dimpling the sea of grain. It is a story of big impulses, ennobling love, splendid sacrifices and immortal deeds.

A Ladder of Swords

By Gilbert Parker

This is a thrilling romance of love, laughter and tears. Its scenes and characters are of the 15th Century when Knights were bold. It is a far cry from the stories of the North Woods which made the reputation of the gifted author, to the society of a well-nigh forgotten age. Angele of Queen Elizabeth's time is as charming as any of our modern day heroines.

The World for Sale

By Gilbert Parker

A vivid story of the Canadian Northwest, of a land and people that throb with life. As an Oriental rug-weaver brings out a rich pattern from strands of apparently inharmonious colors, so Parker weaves into a fascinating whole the brilliant, individual hues of the loves, hates and ambitions of Indians, gypsies, French courcours de bois and a great builder.

Flamsted Quarries

By Mary E. Waller

An American novel of intense interest. The strongest book produced by this author since the famous "Wood-Carver of Lympos." The story is a powerful exposition of present-day conditions of American life, social and industrial. "Firmly drawn characters," "strong and powerful," "with gripping human interest," "one of the really big novels," "full of courage and tenderness," "rings true."

The Unknown Mr. Kent

By Roy Norton

Mr. Kent is a young American, a financial agent dealing in big plans. The course of his business career takes him to an unknown European principality called Marken. The villain of the story is Baron Provask. It is through his wily schemes that the real king is dethroned. Kent by his knowledge of human nature restores the kingdom, but from a monarchy to a self-governing little country. The love affairs of Kent make one of the most interesting threads of the story and the climax is as startling as it is fascinating.

Around Old Chester

By Margaret Deland

A collection of stories about Old Chester folks is welcomed the country over. Doubtless, readers of Mrs. Deland's original volume of "Old Chester Tales" would declare that Old Chester, thanks to her loving descriptions of it, is the most real of all fictional towns. In these seven tales many of the well-known characters—the beloved Dr. Lavendar, Willie King, and others re-appear. There are seven tales in the book full of Old Chester sentiment.

Felix O'Day

By F. Hopkinson Smith

"Felix O'Day" is a novel of New York; the scenes are real places, described with wonderful color, and the people are drawn with the intensely human, broadly sympathetic characterization that has made classic the work of Dickens. It belongs to the body of books that form the permanent part of American literature.

The Rose in the Ring

By George Baker McCutcheon

Any new book of the famous author of "Graustark" is sure to find a large appreciative audience. Each of his books have sold into the hundreds of thousands.

The Maid of the Whispering Hills

By Vingie E. Roe

"The Maid of the Whispering Hills" is one of those unusual stories that stick in the memory. After one lays it down, the tall Canadian maid with her wonderful strength and sweetness, and the three men who loved her, each a hero in his way, abide in the mind like recollections of living people.

Hugh Wynne

Sometime Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel on the Staff of His Excellency General Washington

By Dr. S. Weir Mitchell

It is safe to say that no book published in America has inspired so many favorable opinions as "Hugh Wynne."

The story deals with social life in Philadelphia before and during the Revolution, and with the exciting scenes of the Revolutionary War itself. The time covering a period from 1753 to 1783.

A Cry in the Wilderness

By Mary E. Waller

Much of the success of Miss Waller's writing is due to her comprehension of life and her insight into character. She is also gifted with the rather rare power of imparting her thoughts without sacrificing their vitality or individuality. "A Cry in the Wilderness" is a novel with a plot, and the touch of mystery persists to the end.

Aunt Jane

By Jennette Lee

In Aunt Jane Mrs. Lee has created a real character, essentially human, and full of human philosophy. She is in charge of an endowed hospital. In her province she is a real despot—but always a benevolent one. Everybody adores her and depends upon her utterly in every emergency. Her delayed love story is charmingly told as is the main romance of the two young people in the book.

The Proof of the Pudding

By Meredith Nicholson

The characters in this story of love and business are extraordinarily human, and the situations in which they find themselves are intensely interesting.

The story that combines the mystery and excitement of "The House of a Thousand Candles," the charm of "Otherwise Phyllis," and the strength of "The Main Chance" into the most wholly satisfying novel Nicholson has yet written.

Fighting Byng

By A. Stone

"Fighting Byng" starts as a Georgia cracker, but he meets a government official of the forestry division and with his aid and inspiration rises to great heights.

The secret service plays an important part in the story, which takes its characters on land and sea, as the story deals with contraband of war and spies.

The Clutch of Circumstance

By Marjorie Benton Cooke

This is a mystery story of exceptional dramatic intensity based on an event which thrilled the world.

Roberta Trask becomes involved in a tragedy which astounds and puzzles the Allies.

Miss Cooke tells a story of rapid fire interest and events crowd with breathless tension until the final exposure of secret service shows a husband's unfaltering devotion and love.

Robinetta

By Kate Douglas Wiggin, and others

The authors have given us another delightful love story with an old-world setting. A plum tree and a little old woman form the nucleus around which are gathered the rest of the people and the plot. The exquisite irrepressible youth of Robinetta herself gives the tale freshness and buoyancy.

The Romance of a Xmas Card

By Kate Douglas Wiggin

It tells the story of two young men who went forth from their village to the swifter life of the city, one to prosper, one to fall upon evil ways. At last two Christmas cards brought them both back to the old village, one to find peace and new courage; the other to find his help-mate.

Charming full-page illustrations in color, decorative drawings in black and white, drawn entirely in keeping with the spirit of Mrs. Wiggin's story.

The Side of the Angels

By Basil King

This story is filled with characters so real we feel we have known them somewhere. The scene is laid altogether in America, in a town with conditions that are typical of places where later generations of families, who have started as equals, find themselves at opposite ends of the social scale.

Belinda of the Red Cross

By Robert W. Hamilton

A vivid and absorbing love story, Belinda is an American trained nurse, the central figure in a strong, patriotic and uplifting book. Grim humor is mixed with keenest pathos. Belinda is a character to be remembered long after the great war is a thing of the past. She is truly human, and therefore truly lovable.

Open, Sesame

By Mrs. Baillie Reynolds

Mrs. Baillie Reynolds, who won her laurels writing pure romance, says of her work "I am a story teller pure and simple."

In "Open, Sesame" she has portrayed Ismay Waldron, and her swift, poignant friendship with Hammond, the American boy whom she met in an old French chateau. She is the heroine of the title story, and a promise of what the other stories achieve in the line of mystery and adventure.

This is a special Spring drive and we do not believe we will have to repeat this offer very often. Save this page as a list to order from after you send your first selection. Many will put in a stock for spring, summer and fall reading, while the low price prevails. It is an unusual offer to save money on each book. Think of Gilbert Parker, Kate Douglas Wiggin, Holman Day, F. Hopkinson Smith, and all the others. Reading a good, well-constructed story now and then is a good thing to do; it makes us think and broadens our minds on the daily affairs of life.

The People Who Hid for 200 Years

IN FAR lands I have seen various queens. But it was necessary to come back to the home land to find the most interesting one of all—Queen Hester of North Carolina.

Royalty that can read and write is common enough. Queen Hester can neither read nor write. But she has other accomplishments. She can ride a steer, she can spit fifteen feet and she can shout a mile. And she is a dangerous shot if any marauder comes prowling about the log cabin which serves her as a palace.

Those who imagine that I am writing about a fictitious person may address Welch Galloway, the mountaineer lawyer of Brevard, N. C., who accompanied me on a horseback journey through the mountains, and he will tell them that Queen Hester McGaha is a very real girl and that that is her real name. Yet she will never learn from this periodical or from any letter that I have used her name, for one reason, because she cannot read, and for another, because the McGahas in their mountain retreat receive no mail, not being able to afford a mail-box.

Her grandmother named her. I understand that there are also numerous Queen Victorias in the mountains, but surely none of them can approach Queen Hester, at least in the accomplishments mentioned.

When our horses, lathered with foam from their climb to the mountain-top, had been tied to an apple tree before the cabin and a savage dog had announced our arrival by growls, the Queen approached from the pig-pen, royally seated upon a pet steer. Ma McGaha followed and the two greeted the "furriners." We were ushered into the windowless cabin which was, however, well ventilated and lighted by at least fifty chinks between the logs.

The interior was furnished with a huge, lumpy bed which looked as if it would feel like a relief map of the Alleghenies, a spinning-wheel, a rough-hewn table, a great mole for splitting wooden rails, and a brilliant rattle-snake skin.

Detecting a camera, Ma McGaha immediately wished to have her "likeness took" plowing. Returning to the yard, Ma and Queen Hester hitched Bill, the versatile little steer, to the plow, fastening ropes to his horns with which to guide the animal. The furrow cut by that plow contained as many curves as those described by a cowboy's lasso.

The required "likeness" was "took"—also a picture of Queen Hester. She is a barbaric, wildly beautiful girl with her flashing, even teeth, her quick smile and abundant vitality. If well gowned and schooled she would be a veritable "queen." But she is twenty-one years old and has never spent a single day in school. The dress she wore she sheared from the sheep's back with her own hand, carded, spun and wove it, and cut it out by a homemade pattern. She has never seen a store pattern. Railroads and automobiles are unknown to her and when a piano was mentioned she asked, in all seriousness:

"What is a piano?"

WHO are these people, cast high and dry upon lonesome mountain tops by the sea of civilization, like castaways on remote islands?

Go to London, England, with a camera and you will be besieged by small boys who will plead to have their "likeness took" and will use many other expressions identical with those used by the mountain folk of our South. What is the explanation?

Back in the eighteenth century the Southern pilgrim fathers crossed the sea. Those who remained on the lowlands near the coast progressed with the progress of the times. Those who penetrated the Appalachian mountains and succeeded in getting through them to the fertile plains on the other side, have also progressed, their habits and ideas changing with the changing times. But there were some who got as far as the mountains and then an axle-tree broke down—or one of the party became ill—or they fell in love with the dreamy blue haze and the woods and the hills. They stopped in the mountains.

Shut away from the world, imprisoned in the glorious freedom of the land of the sky, they have known nothing of the movements of men. The speech and habits of another land have remained. Civilization stopped with them. If you wish to see a cross-section of the eighteenth century alive in the twentieth, visit the back-country of our Southern mountains.

At one time pioneer America was the land of the log cabin. Now America is the land of brick, stone and steel. But in Appalachia the pioneer log cabin remains unchanged since the days of the pilgrims. One room. A great stone fireplace. Perhaps a single glassless window with a pig under it on the outside to serve as a sort of animated garbage pail to which anything may be thrown that is not wanted in the cabin.

VERY often there are no windows at all. A young man who had been out to see the world came back to his mountain home.

"Here!" he said. "We ought to have windows in this house," and he proceeded to cut them in. The family looked on passively.

When he had gone, the family became active. "What's the use of having these holes to let in the wind?" they said, and they boarded them all up.

Then there is the occasional mountaineer who can't be bothered building a permanent cabin at all. For him, moving is a simple matter.

"When I move," said one, "all I hatter do is to put out the fire and call the dog."

Even in the smallest cabins there are sometimes so many children that it is difficult to find names for them all. In one family "The Last 'Un" was the only name carried by a child eight months old.

"Pearl, bring me the Last 'Un," called the mother, who complained to me that she didn't know what to call the last baby. She had enough plain names in the family and wanted something a shade more fancy, but she had been through the seed catalog three times and couldn't find a thing that suited her. She had rather taken a liking to "Chrysanthemum" but Pa had laughed at it, saying it was too long a name to yell when The Last 'Un started crawling out on the log over the creek. The child would be in the creek before Ma could ever get the "mum" out.

The oldest son, worldly wise because he had been to France in the great war, suggested "Joy" as a name which might meet the demands of both parents. Ma admitted it was "fancy." Pa cared little for it, but did grant that it would yell easy—properly shouted it could be heard yon side of Stone Mountain.

"Well," said the son, "what more do you want? It's a fancy name and it yells easy."

A name that will "yell easy" is of no slight importance in this country of far-stretching mountain slopes and valleys.

IN ANOTHER cabin, too small for its family, the visitor was invited to stay all night. He furtively looked around for a bed, and saw none. Hanging on the wall, however, was a mattress. The cabin, measuring only ten feet by twelve, was too small to accommodate a bedstead. When bed-time came the chairs were cleared out of the way and the mattress was laid on the floor. The candidates for sleep undressed in the yard, removing outer clothes only, each one hanging his garments on a separate limb of the cherry tree.

Then all lay down on the mattress—crosswise—for there would not have been room for all lying lengthwise. The visitor lay next the fireplace; then the boy; then a space was left for father who was coming late; then mother; then small daughter; then grown daughter. Six on one bed.

At about two A. M. something got after the chickens. Father called to grown daughter to get up and see. She climbed over the others and went out.

When she returned, father said: "Hit's no use tryin' to go sleep again. Let's all git up."

The visitor did not savor the suggestion; but all got up and adjourned to the open-air wardrobe at the cherry tree. The mattress was rehung and a pine torch was lighted. That home possessed only one book, "The Royal Path of Life," but none of the family could read it. This was their chance in a lifetime to learn the contents of the book, and by delicate hints, for even the roughest mountaineer has inborn delicacy, they pressed the visitor into service. From two-thirty to six A. M., by the light of a burning torch, he read to an absolutely rapt audience.

THE hunger of the mountaineers for an "edification" is pathetic. The public schools cannot satisfy that hunger, for they are too few and far between, and the few schools which do exist are usually open only during the summer months. Hence the urgent need for mission schools. The schools conducted by various denominations in the Southern highlands are doing a work of practical Christian education which I have not seen surpassed anywhere in the world. And the students in these schools mean business. Most of them work their way through on their own resources. Think of a primary pupil fifteen years old! Yet many of the mountain young people are that age before they have an opportunity to get their first day's schooling.

Unable to use a knife and fork, never having seen a doll, knowing none of the things that surround most young people, a girl of fifteen applied for an education. She was unable to walk up and down the stairs in the school building without falling—a common difficulty among the mountaineers since there are no stairs in their cabins. But, given the opportunity, she developed into a leader, won the prize in debate, took honors in her studies and is now a graceful and accomplished young woman about to graduate from an Eastern college.

That Cry of "Personal Liberty"

THE dog still bays the moon and the fool continues to lift up his voice and shout against the tempest. But neither moon nor tempest is perturbed. For the dog is only a dog and the fool is only a fool. Prohibition, procured by a vast preponderance of American sentiment—make no mistake about that, for the wily legislators who ratified it did so with their ears to the ground—and confirmed by the Supreme Court, is here to stay. Yet the voice of the fool still cries in the land: "They have taken away my personal liberty and I will not be comforted." Isn't that funny when you come to think of it—when you really think of it?

What is this personal liberty certain persons claim is theirs by right, guaranteed them by the Constitution? Is it the kind the framers of that great, beneficent, basic document intended? Does it, as presently used, mean personal liberty to be decent, industrious, enterprising, thrifty? Does it mean the exercise of a decent regard for the rights of other persons? Does it mean to be useful, law-abiding, patriotic? Does it mean the right to be happy and to promote the happiness of others? To advance towards a higher civilization? To protect our children and our women? To be constructive? To do unto others—especially in the matter of not infringing upon their rights—as we would be done by?

Don't let us deceive ourselves or permit the noise of the mourners to deceive us. Personal liberty, in its present sense, doesn't mean any one of the foregoing things. In fact, it might properly be defined as the right to degrade, debauch, violate, corrupt, impair, intrude on, pull down, the right to reduce one's self from the image of Divinity to a gross and imbecile thing.

Personal liberty, in regard to the Eighteenth Amendment, is nothing but a camouflage for personal license, a camouflage worn so thin that even a baby in long clothes might recognize the disgusting spectre it seeks so feebly to hide.

THE Constitution guarantees the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all men—all men, mark you. That means that one man shall be protected against another man who would impair his liberty—or it means nothing at all. Now, why did Uncle Sam guarantee such a right to anybody? Was his purpose a beneficent or a wicked one? Did he mean to build up his people or tear them down? Let's give the old gentleman the benefit of the doubt, allow that he was constructive in intent. On that ground then there is no such thing as personal liberty

What It Means in Connection with the Eighteenth Amendment

By HENRY IRVING DODGE

—as used by the wailers. Bloomingdale and Sing Sing are full of men who are wailing about having been robbed of their personal liberty. Men who have incited to arson and sedition—now in prison—claim they have been deprived of the inalienable right of free speech. Inalienable—it is to laugh—another ludicrously overworked word. There's no such thing as inalienable right or inalienable anything else. The word has no business in the language.

Let us examine the moral basis of this so-called personal liberty claim. Every drinker is a potential lunatic. Make no mistake about that. Now, here's the inconsistency of the plea of the wailer: we put a lunatic in a strong room, guard and restrain him by strong men trained in the business of rough-house work, but a drunkard we turn loose in a family of small children, thrust a wolf into the lamb-pen. That is the greatest crime, mark me, of which a so-called civilized community has ever been guilty. For no words can describe the terror suffered by the children of the drunkard, who is liable to come home at any moment and torture them, an apprehension that is never free from the consciousness of the little ones. Many of us parlor Pharisees, parlor patriots, brag of the security of our own children, and in the same breath complain of the act of strong men and women who have deprived fiends of their personal liberty to degrade and torture other—unprotected—children.

We claim that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. We carry this to the extent of assigning counsel, at the expense of the county, to the meanest man that ever stood at the bar. That's the personal liberty we grant him. Then, in the same breath, we condemn the child to starvation and the things that come in its wake, as surely as the night follows the day—crime, disgrace, prison, and possibly the chair. And we do it by granting his father the personal liberty to get drunk, make a lunatic of himself. That's the way the baby pays for the personal liberty society vouchsafes the father.

Doesn't that make personal liberty a horrid, ghastly joke? And the contention of the wailers is so shallow, so diaphanous, so absurd, that one wonders that even the hard-pressed rum interests ever had the audacity, the cheek, to resort to it. Now, by all justice and by the intent of the framers of the Constitution, the public never had any right to barter the child's liberty—a thing it didn't own—for the father's, and which it did barter because the old man had a vote.

LOOKING at the question from the low plane of economy, no man was ever entitled to the personal liberty that would put him in a condition to starve a child, maim it, make it a burden on the community. For does the Constitution give any man individually the right to impose a burden upon another man—a part of the community—make him contribute to the support of his children—and without due process of law? The economic as well as the moral ramifications of this question of personal liberty spread out in all directions, mix up with and are interwoven through the whole social fabric. Does personal liberty mean the right for a man, by drinking, to put himself in a condition not to render to his employer the adequate service for which he receives compensation? Doesn't that come pretty close to giving him the personal liberty to pick his employer's pocket?

Does personal liberty to the drinking man include the right to indulge in all kinds of vices? For that's what he does. Make no mistake about that. Does personal liberty to the drinker include the right to make a nuisance of himself? The other night in a bootblack stand sat five men, all quiet, attending to their own business. Suddenly entered a drunken man and by his blatant, drivelling profanity and obscenity made life a burden to the others, for the time being. The personal liberty of one was paid for by the personal liberty of five. How often is the personal liberty of a whole carload of persons sacrificed to the personal liberty of one drunken rowdy? Does that seem equitable?

In a word, is the booze fighter the only one whose personal liberty must be guarded so tenderly? The drinker has had personal liberty for a great many years. Why not let the people enjoy it for a while?

But the soap-box echoes from the publicity department of the rum interests and from parlor patriots are still heard in the land. The people are told the Constitution guaranteed them certain rights. Very good. But the Constitution has been changed—and by a vast majority of the people. Make no mistake about that.

But the dog still bays the moon.

The Boy Problem Walks In

And How It Is Entertained

By A MERE MAN

YOU may possibly remember that a little while ago, I related a part of my experience in entertaining the House-keeping Problem. I found very soon after that, when my wife had recovered her health, that there were other Problems in the Home, and the one I am going to tell about now, if you are willing to listen to it, is the Boy Problem.

The Boy in our home is a fine boy, if I do say it, and he has never given us much anxiety until lately. He is just beginning his college course, after finishing High School with credit, and we were proud of him because he was so steady and had such a good record in his studies. In fact, I was so absorbed in my business, making my $3,500 a year, that I think I sort of let the Boy's Mother have most of the responsibility of bringing him up in the straight and narrow way.

But one evening, when the children were out of the house (you remember, perhaps, I told you we have two boys and a girl, the younger boy in High school with his sister) and I had settled down with a new novel, a good detective story, my wife said, as she looked over the sitting-room table at me, "I'm getting worried about the Boy."

We have always called the older son "Boy" because his full name is Boynton, and his schoolmates have shortened it up.

I dropped my book on the table and said, "What's the matter?"

"He is beginning to smoke."

"Smoke! How do you know?" (I had almost said "Holy" smoke, but my wife cured me of slang several years ago. Sometime I will tell you how she did it.)

"He told me."

MY WIFE said it so calmly that I did not detect the fact that she was on the verge of tears.

"How long has he been smoking?" I asked, because the Boy had virtually promised me that he would not smoke until he was twenty-one, and he was only just a little over nineteen.

"I don't know, but he confessed to me this morning that he had acquired the habit at the college smoker, and that nearly every student in his class smoked."

"Cigarettes?" I asked, getting angrier every minute.

"A pipe!" my wife said, and with the word she suddenly broke down and began to weep.

My wife cries so seldom that I almost felt as if the end of the world had come. I tried to comfort her, and said a number of foolish things such as the average man says to his wife when he doesn't know just what to say to her. But in spite of all I could think of, she seemed quite depressed.

"I feel so disappointed," she said as she finally wiped her tears away. "I did so want him to keep from this habit. And he knows how I feel. Yet it does not seem to make any difference."

"Wait till he gets home. I'll have it out with him!" I said, perhaps a little sternly. For at that, his mother spoke up as if alarmed.

"Don't be too severe on him. I'm sure he wants to please us generally."

"Oh, well, I won't overdo it. But I don't like the habit and I don't want him to contract it."

"Perhaps,"—my wife said timidly, and then stopped.

"Perhaps what?" I asked as I picked up my book again.

BUT my wife did not say what, and it was only after she went up-stairs and I stayed below to wait up for the Boy that I thought I knew what she meant. I kept thinking it over as I read the detective story, until finally I threw the book down on the table, out of patience with it because it seemed to me that any one could write a better story without half trying. And so I sat there until the Boy came in, a little late, for the younger ones had returned from their school entertainment some time before and had gone up-stairs. So the Boy and I had it out all alone.

"Good-night, father," he said as he started straight for the stairs after hanging up his hat in the hall.

"Wait a minute," I said. "I want to have a little talk with you."

He looked scared at that, but he came in and sat down by the table. I kept trying to remember what his mother had said about not being too severe with him, but I expect I seemed rather stern to the Boy, for acting on a habit I have, I came straight to the subject.

"I understand you have taken to smoking. Didn't you tell me you would wait until you were twenty-one before you began?"

"No, father, I did not make a promise. I said I would try to wait. And I have tried; but what's the use when all the fellows smoke? I don't want to be queer, and unsocial. And smoking is the rule at all the college functions, at least nearly all of them."

"But you know your mother doesn't like it. She is pretty much upset by it."

"I know" The Boy seemed real concerned about that. "I told her about it. And I don't smoke very much, and not at all in my room."

"But you smoke a pipe," I said, getting a little warm over it. "Have you got it with you? Let me see it!"

HE TOOK it promptly out of his pocket and handed it over. I took it and said before I thought, "It is just like the one I used—," and then I stopped and eyed the Boy severely, as I laid the pipe, a short and black affair, down on the table.

SEVERAL weeks ago the Christian Herald published a delightful article, "When a Problem Walked In," telling how the difficulties of keeping up the home when Mother was ill were met by "A Mere Man." The writer was a man well known throughout the country but who preferred that the intimate picture of his home life should remain anonymous. Here is another of his discussions of home problems even more readable than the first.

"Where have you been smoking tonight?" I asked to bring the conversation back to the original subject.

"At the Y. smoker," the Boy said.

"Do you mean that the Y. has a smoker?"

"They always have one at the social meetings." And he added, "I used to be almost the only fellow at the Y. that did not smoke, and that's one reason I began. I don't see any great harm, father, and besides—you—"

"Well, go on, what about me?"

"You smoke," the Boy said, and his look went straight as a drawn line from his eye to my upper left-hand vest pocket out of which stuck two cigars.

"But not a dirty pipe."

"But you just said you used—"

"That was years ago when I was in the University," I said without thinking. And then, before the Boy could say any more I went on. "We won't argue the matter. Your mother does not like it, and I think it is a bad habit for you. I want you to quit right now. No more smoking."

For the first time in his life I thought the Boy looked at me sullenly and defiantly. He rose, and reached out his hand to take the pipe off the table, but I covered it with my hand.

"Leave it here," I said shortly. "We will finish this talk in the morning. Go to bed and sleep off your feeling."

The Boy went away without saying good-night, which hurt me, because it was the first time.

BUT after I heard him close his door, I sat by the table thinking. And the more I thought the less I thought—of myself. I began to finish that sentence, that my wife had begun when she had said so timidly "perhaps—"

I sat up pretty late that night, but when I came down-stairs next morning, after a not very sound sleep, I called the Boy into the library and asked my wife to come with him.

I laid the Boy's pipe down on the library table and then I laid the two cigars down by the side of it. And looking at the Boy's mother as much as at him I said, "I want to make a straight bargain with you about the smoking business."

"With me?" said my wife.

"Well, yes, with you and the Boy. I will give up smoking cigars if you will give up smoking a pipe. What do you say?"

The Boy's eye sparkled, and he jumped to his feet.

"You don't mean it, do you, Dad?"

"I never meant anything more in my life. The habit is a bad one, and I cannot afford it."

"Then it's a bargain," said the Boy, and with the word he reached out for the pipe and threw it with all his might down into the fireplace. It was a cheap imitation briar made of some brittle stuff that went into small pieces. I shook hands with the Boy somewhat dramatically, and was about to sneak out of the room, but if I remember rightly, at that point my wife pulled my head down (she is very short, and I am very tall) and kissed me hard. "I thought, perhaps, if you would do that—" she whispered.

BUT only a little while after the smoke problem was disposed of satisfactorily the Boy's mother came to me with another one, and this time it was serious. It was another evening when we happened to be alone. I glanced up from something I was reading, and the Boy's mother was looking mighty worried. "Do you know what the Boy has done, now?" she said.

"No, he hasn't robbed a bank, has he?"

"It's almost as bad," she said. "He's fallen in love!"

"In love!" I said just as if I had never heard the word before. "Whom with?"

"Ah, that is what makes it a problem. She is one of the silly little things in college; the last girl I would have chosen for the Boy!"

"Leave them to me!" I said somewhat shortly. "He can't ruin his career over some silly girl! The idea! Why, he's only nineteen!"

"But," said my wife timidly. "You were only nineteen when we—"

"But that was different," I said decidedly. "You let me attend to the Boy."

So at the first convenient opportunity I confronted the Boy with this new problem.

"I want to talk with you about this—this girl business," I said to him one evening when we were alone.

The Boy straightened right up and looked defiant. "This is a matter of life and death to me, Dad. You must not interfere."

"Are you engaged to her?" I asked after a pause.

"No, not yet. But we are thinking it over."

"I don't want to interfere with your affairs, but will you promise me to do certain things which are perfectly reasonable?"

The Boy hesitated a moment, but the confidence he had shown in me since the smoke problem won the day and he said, frankly, "Yes, if they are reasonable."

"Well, then, I want you honestly to do this. I don't know this girl, but your mother seems to, and she is worried. All I want you to do is to put these things into your mind and watch. And you needn't tell me anything. Let your mother know. Be honest now. First, does this girl dress modestly at the college and elsewhere? Second, does she use slang when she talks to you and other boys? Third, does she belong to a church or Sunday school and go to them? Fourth, what kind of shows and movies does she prefer to go to? Fifth, is she willing to have you get her the most expensive candy and flowers, or does she tell you to be more economical out of your allowance?"

I thought at first the Boy was going to explode. But he seemed to pull himself together, and held out his hand to meet mine.

"It's a bargain?"

"Yes, Dad," he said, and he said it soberly.

My wife wanted to know what I had said to the Boy, but I preferred not to tell her. "You wait, and see what he says. We made a bargain and I believe he will be honest about it," I said. And being a very wise and unusual woman she did not ask me anything more.

BUT a few weeks after, she came to me with a smile on her face that reminded me of the time when I was nineteen myself.

"The Boy has waked up from his dream about that girl," she said. "He is disgusted with her and the engagement is impossible. He says he has discovered that she is immodest in her dress, uses slang when talking to boys, never goes to Sunday school and seldom to church, prefers movies that are exciting and sometimes questionable, and never remonstrates with him for buying expensive flowers and candy from his pocket allowance. He says he is done with her, and you can't imagine how happy I am. What a tragedy if such a girl had come into our family!"

"Yes, indeed!" I said humbly.

"I wonder what you said to the Boy," my wife suddenly said.

"Yes, I wonder."

"As for me," she said, "I don't know what you said to the Boy. But I prayed that he might not make the mistake of his life. And my prayer was answered."

And I am wondering ever since whether I had anything to do with solving the Boy Problem after all. For I am only a mere man. But his Mother—

IT IS a substantial public service that has been rendered by United States Senator Spencer in preparing and submitting for the consideration of Congress a tabulated statement of the cost of the world war to all the nations. Accepting it as approximately accurate, one can not refrain from amazement at the staggering totals which the Senator submits in the following table, as showing world conditions on January 1:

Entering further into details, the Senator shows that the ultimate loss, even under the best conditions, will far exceed these figures. As consequential losses we must include pensions, civilian damages and various war costs which can not yet be computed, and these together will swell the grand total by many millions. Our own final losses he estimates at $41,873,948,225 and of Japan $231,818,000.

More than twenty years have passed since the famous Russian statistician, Jean de Bloch, wrote his book, "The War of the Future," in which he warned the world against the next great conflict, which he predicted would bankrupt all the nations involved. Many have claimed that the influence of that book so impressed the then Czar, and ultimately other rulers, that it led indirectly to the organization of The Hague Court and the World Peace Tribunal, to which some thirty nations were signatories. This prediction has been fulfilled almost literally. The war left ruin and bankruptcy in its wake over half the world. Now, the problem before the nations is to find a way to world peace by the establishment of a more authoritative body than The Hague Tribunal, and organized on practical lines. The figures submitted by Senator Spencer form the strongest possible argument for a reduction of armaments, and this should be the immediate problem for the new administration.

In his inaugural address, President Harding set forth the national desire "to participate in any seemly program likely to lessen the probability of war, and to promote that brotherhood of mankind which must be God's highest conception of human relationship." This expresses accurately the hope of the whole nation, and we trust it may be realized. He recognized the new order of things, and declared that we are ready to associate ourselves with the nations in council and confidence, to find a way to bring about disarmament and to reduce the frightful expense of supporting armies and navies. This he believes should be accomplished through mediation, conciliation and arbitration. He believes we should heartily unite, taking care, however, always to preserve our national sovereignty.

This leaves the way open for America to do her share in the great world-task, not in a servile way, but as a directing influence.

"Main Street"

THIS is the title of a book which is receiving a great deal of notice from critics and reviewers. One extravagant review says that it is the greatest book of the century. Another says that it is a perfect description of the average small Western town. Still another says the book marks an epoch in describing the struggle of women towards domestic freedom.

This is not a book notice, but a frank expression of real good old-fashioned indignation that a book which has received and is still receiving most fulsome praise should contain the most untrue and distorted picture of a minister and a minister's wife that a novelist could possibly draw. And it raises the question, at least among people who have been raised among church folks in the average Western town, why is it that so many novelists of the present time persist in drawing pictures of ministers and ministers' wives which are absolutely false and misleading? They are like the pictures seen in so many films where ministers are so often held up to ridicule, and caricatured as narrow-minded bigots. Do such ministers really exist? And are they really a type of the sort to be found in the average small town in the West?

After an experience of over thirty years in the West, meeting ministers of many denominations, in very small towns, the writer cannot recall ever seeing any one who in the remotest degree resembled the minister and the minister's wife as pictured in the book called "Main Street." The average minister in the small town out West is generally far above the average in the matter of intelligence and culture and breadth of theology and in the expression of it in his sermons and addresses.

It may be that this book, which has received such unbounded praise from critics and reviewers, is all that they say it is in the matter of a frank picture of a raw, gossipy, crude, self-satisfied, narrow-minded, materialistic town, characteristic of a new country. But it is also true that the church and the minister, as depicted in the book, are as absolutely unknown to the Western town as if they had been created, not out of an imagination which has no basis for its pictures, but from the distorted ignorance of a writer who could not possibly know from experience the real ministers and the real ministers' families, who, more than any other factor, have moulded the characters and shaped the destinies of more of the people in the town than any other people who live in it.

We are getting very tired, some of us who have known ministers and church people all our lives, of the distorted and false characters in novels which the novelist calls ministers. It is an insult to the Church and a denial of the facts to give such impressions to the reading public.

The Films Coming Under Control

IT IS becoming evident that the nation-wide movement for clean films, of which the Christian Herald has been the outstanding advocate, is at last beginning to bear fruit. We lately announced the action of the Lasky Corporation in deciding to bar objectionable films from its productions. This step has been followed by a declaration from the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry announcing its decision to establish a "definite and concrete plan which will insure against the production of questionable films, and will prevent the exploitation of pictures in a manner offensive to good taste." Governor Miller of New York has joined the crusade, and has demanded a strong moving picture censorship in the Empire State. The best censorship, however, would be the vigilant watchfulness of the public and especially the churches. Any official body of censors is apt to become mere political job-holders.

It is understood that the reforms which the National Association has in view will be drastic and far-reaching, drawing the line firmly at all films dealing with sex plays, white slavery, commercialized vice, gambling and drinking, and giving warning that any member of the organization refusing to uphold the authorities and to carry out the proposed reforms to the utmost extent, will be subjected to expulsion from the Association membership. Outlaw concerns which may persist in offending will soon find themselves out of business.

We are glad to note that the churches are awakening to the opportunity for a real national film reform, and are beginning to co-operate with the agencies now at work for that end. At a three days' conference of ministers and lay workers, held recently in the Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, the question of adapting motion pictures to their religious recreational program, was freely discussed. It was admitted that most of the films now offered are unsuitable; but the point was made that there are several film exchanges that are now beginning to realize this, and to furnish pictures suited to this special need. Rev. Geo. Wales King, of St. Louis, said the kind of pictures shown in the average "movie" in St. Louis, he regarded as totally unfit. Pictures are shown there which would not be tolerated in Pennsylvania or Ohio, where there is a rigid and systematic public oversight. More hopeful was the statement by a Chicago pastor, Rev. Geo. J. Searles, who outlined a regular Friday afternoon film program in his parish which gave general satisfaction, the film exchange using special care in meeting the needs. Every Friday the program was begun with a short devotional service and the pictures that followed were in harmony with the spirit of the gathering.

One of the delegates estimated that about 5,000 churches in many states are now using films on week days, the pictures being selected especially with a view to their effect upon the young. The Church is rousing itself to offset the evil lure of the film, and transform it into an aid to religion and morals. As the film has doubtless come to stay, it must be purified until it is made thoroughly clean and unobjectionable, as well as entertaining and instructive. The corporations now recognize this and they must ultimately yield to the demand for a legitimate censorship. And the Church owes it as a duty, not only to its own immediate parishes, but to the whole nation, and especially to the young, to address itself to this task of purification.

The President's Inaugural

THE following sentences from President Harding's Inaugural address are worth reading by all American citizens who did not read it, and worth a second reading by all those who did. These sentences might have been spoken from any number of Christian pulpits in the United States:

"We sense the feeling of the human heart for fellowship, fraternity and co-operation. We crave friendship and harbor no hate."

"We are ready to associate ourselves with the nations of the world, great and small, for conference, for counsel, to seek the expressed views of world opinion, to recommend a way to approximate disarmament and relieve the crushing burdens of military and naval establishments."

"America is ready to encourage, eager to initiate, anxious to participate in any seemly program likely to lessen the probability of war and promote that brotherhood of mankind which must be God's highest conception of human relationship."

"We hold no national prejudice, we entertain no spirit of revenge, we do not hate, we do not covet, we dream of no conquest nor boast of armed prowess."

"With the nation-wide induction of womanhood into our political life we may count upon her intuitions, her refinement, her intelligence and her influence to exalt the social order. We count upon her exercise of the full privileges and the performance of duties of citizenship to speed the attainment of the highest state."

"I had rather submit our industrial controversies to the conference table in advance than to a settlement table after conflict and suffering. The earth is thirsting for the cup of good-will."

"Service is the supreme commitment of life. I would rejoice to acclaim the era of the golden rule and crown it with the autocracy of service."

"I have taken the solemn oath of office on that passage of Holy Writ wherein it is asked 'What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy and walk humbly with thy God.' This my plight to God and country."

The Earliest Christian Converts

TO MANY minds, the news which comes by the cable that the British Government is asking the United States to find homes for 30,000 Nestorian Christians in America, would hardly seem to call for more than passing attention. It has, however, a much deeper significance when we come to look into the matter. The Nestorians are regarded as among the first, if not the very earliest, converts to Christianity in the East. Furthermore, they themselves date their conversion back to the preaching of the Apostle Thomas, and there is a well-preserved tradition among them which not only claims Jewish descent, but traces their ancestry back to Ur of the Chaldees, and to Abraham himself.

Whatever merit these claims may possess, the fact is sufficiently authenticated that the Nestorians are not only among the oldest, but are probably the purest of the Oriental Churches, and may be regarded as the first Protestant Christians of whom we have any record. They have preserved their faith through all the long generations, and amid many trials and vicissitudes. Further, they have been a strong missionary force, and have spread the faith in Persia, Syria and India, among the Asiatic peoples long before any other religious organizations took up the work.

The remnants of this old nationality have been severe sufferers during the world-war. Driven from their homes in northwestern Persia, they have been living in camps under British protection. Many readers of the Christian Herald will remember the effort that was made in the early years of the war to send relief to the Nestorians who were even then widely scattered. That effort was only partially successful.

In view of the restrictions recently placed upon immigration by our government, it may be impracticable to find homes for these people; but something should be done for their relief. It is probable that a plan will be devised by the churches, so that these descendants of the primitive Christians may at least be kept alive until the way is open for their permanent settlement in their own ancient land.

The World News of the Week

Allies Seize More German Towns After London Conference Fails

FOLLOWING the failure of the Germans to submit acceptable reparation proposals to the Allies at London, and the abrupt ending of that conference, French, British and Belgian troops advanced into Germany to seize the towns of Duesseldorf, Duisburg and Ruhrort as a measure to enforce compliance with the Allied demands. To the advance the Germans offered no resistance and the occupation was achieved without incident; but the Berlin government maintained a passive attitude, making no further effort to bring about a settlement, and the prospects were for a prolonged occupation.

In the final session of the London conference, Premier Lloyd George in scathing terms announced the rejection of the new German terms offered in reply to the Allied ultimatum. He declared the German offer simply evaded and postponed a settlement, since Germany made it conditional on the retention of Upper Silesia, and termed it not even a proposal for five years, but for five weeks. He denounced Berlin's refusal to accept responsibility for the war, and showed that the Allied nations were carrying a greater war burden than Germany.

Dr. Simons, the German foreign minister and spokesman, then obtained a few minutes for discussion with his colleagues, but offered no more reasonable solution, and the conference broke up. Orders for the Allied advance were issued at once, and while it was in progress Dr. Simons and the German delegation returned to Berlin.

As a measure of protest Berlin recalled its ambassadors from London, Paris and Rome, but carefully refrained from creating the impression that this was a hostile act, such as precedes a declaration of war. It was argued that Germany was powerless to resist the Allied advance, but could not permit her representatives to remain at their posts as though nothing had happened. Dr. Simons also announced an appeal to the League of Nations Assembly against the infliction of penalties, but the London press regarded this as somewhat of a joke and saw no reason to fear that the appeal would produce any result.

The American troops on the Rhine took no action during the Allied advance, and it was announced in Washington that the American Government was not now considering the question of their withdrawal. The likelihood that an American withdrawal would be misconstrued abroad made it probable they would remain longer than would have been the case otherwise.

New Administration Under Way

THE task of getting the new administration in smooth running order has been proceeding rapidly, with President Harding and the members of his official family taking up their duties seriously and unostentatiously.

The European situation early was forced on the attention of President Harding, for he had not been in office a week before it was announced by the French foreign office that negotiations were under way between the French Embassy in Washington and the State Department in an effort to induce him to favor acceptance of a modified League of Nations. Ambassador Jusserand early called on Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State, and they conferred at length. It was believed France was willing to make almost any concessions to obtain American participation.

On the Monday night after his inauguration, President Harding held a four-hour dinner conference at the White House with a score of Senate and House leaders as a means of breaking the ground for the big talks of the coming session of Congress, which he announced later would be called for a date not earlier than April 4, but which might be deferred until a week later. One of the principal topics at the conference was whether tariff or revenue revision should have precedence, a question which revealed wide difference of opinion and which was referred to the Ways and Means and Finance Committees for a further canvass of the situation. President Harding said other conferences were to be held later and emphasized the fact that no attempt was being made by a few men to lay down a program. "We are starting to formulate a program in advance of legislation," he added. "This is the beginning of the program of co-operation between the Executive and Congress. It is the early step in the fulfillment of campaign pledges."

The first session of the new cabinet lasted for two hours, and an innovation in cabinet methods was the seating of Vice-President Coolidge at the north end of the table opposite the President. It was more in the nature of a get-together meeting than a real business session, and most of the time was taken up with the presentation by each secretary of an outline of the policies of his department.

Mr. Harding sent to the Senate a message urging prompt ratification of the long-delayed treaty with Colombia, in the interest of cordial relations. Republicans bitterly opposed ratification when the treaty was presented by Mr. Wilson and twenty-four Republican senators still are said to be against it. The Senate agreed to vote on the treaty on the eighth day of the extra session.

As his personal physician, Mr. Harding selected Dr. Charles E. Sawyer, of Marion, and sent to the senate his nomination as a Brigadier-General of the Army, Medical Section. For Comptroller of the Currency he has chosen D. R. Crissinger, a schoolmate and a lifelong friend, who is president of a Marion bank. Mr. Crissinger is a Democrat, but was an active Harding supporter.

Ruling Permits Beer-Making

AN OPINION handed down by A. Mitchell Palmer on March 3, but not made public until several days after he had ceased to be attorney-general has evoked heated protests from the friends of prohibition as tending to loosen the enforcement laws and to facilitate illicit traffic in intoxicants. It was that beers and wines may be prescribed in unlimited quantities as medicines, and that it is not within the power of the Internal Revenue Bureau, through regulations, to limit the number of permits which may be issued for the manufacture and sale of spirituous, vinous and malt liquors for medicinal purposes, except that permits for retail sale are limited to reputable druggists.

The Volstead Act fixed one pint as the maximum amount of spirituous liquors which a physician might prescribe for one patient in any ten-day period, setting no limits on beer and wine prescriptions; and Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, had argued that only spirituous liquors such as whisky could be manufactured and sold for medical use. Mr. Palmer's opinion overruled this contention and permits traffic in beers and wines subject only to the limitations of the Volstead act on non-beverage intoxicants. It appeared contradictory, however, stating in one paragraph that "the intention was to leave the physician unfettered by governmental control" in determining the quantity of liquor that may be used to advantage, and arguing in the next paragraph that "regulations may very properly limit the quantity of liquor of any and all kinds which shall be called for by a single prescription."

In thirty-nine states laws have been passed against the manufacture and sale of beer, and these states will not suffer from the ruling. In the others it was predicted any extensive production of beer and wines under the guise of "medicine" would open the way for wholesale violations of the law. The brewers were openly jubilant. Many breweries have been making near-beer and can turn to the manufacture of the intoxicating variety at once. The dry leaders prepared to make a vigorous fight against the ruling and hoped to prevent acceptance of the opinion by officials of the new administration. If that fails, they will have recourse to amendments to the Volstead act and to the strengthening of state laws.

Russian Revolts Continue

WITH reports from Russia still widely at variance and the Bolsheviks in control of all avenues of direct communication, it is nevertheless evident that formidable movements against the Soviet government are in progress and that large areas are affected by the revolts. After denying persistently that outbreaks had occurred, Bolshevik officials have admitted serious disorders, but predicted the opposition would be crushed in a few days.

Despatches to London indicated that the risings in Moscow had been crushed effectually and that the Soviet officials remained in full control. The troubles there were in the nature of trade union strikes rather than military operations; but it appeared the government had suppressed them by force instead of improving economic conditions, and a recurrence of disorders was predicted.

Regarding conditions in Petrograd there was much

"Who Is This Jesus?"

A Sermon by REV. IRA DWIGHT LYTTLE *

TEXT. Matt. 21:9, 10. "Who Is this?"

OUR conception of persons, events or things, is an important matter, especially our conception of persons. It is important because it matters not only to ourselves, but in some degree, great or small, it affects the other man. No matter how much some individual may tell you that he is untouched by the opinions others may have of him, still down deep in his heart he does care; and in some cases he cares so much that that opinion of the other is either a barrier to his progress, or a stepping-stone to higher things. And the person holding the opinion of another is to a certain extent "made or marred" according as his opinion is high or low.

If, then, it matters that we hold an opinion, or have a conception concerning another, I think we may go a step further and say the effect of our conception is greater according to the importance of the position occupied by that other of whom we think. And if that other be the God-Man, the Christ who came into the world, I feel sure that I am not going too far when I say, that our eternity rests upon our conception of Jesus.

By way of leading up to your conception of Jesus, let us see what some others who lived in His day and had contact with Him, thought of Him; for it is always more or less helpful to us to know what others think, even when we may not feel to agree with them.

About the time when the fame of Jesus was beginning to spread throughout the country, He returned from a preaching tour and went to His own home. Quite naturally He found His way into the synagogue, and taught the people. What did they think of it, and of Him? They were offended by His preaching, and asked the question, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Joseph, the carpenter?" They were evidently not satisfied with the rating they gave Him personally, but indicated by their question that "like springs from like."

It was hardly conceivable to these people that this youth who had grown up in their midst, who had worked with His hands at honest toil, putting His shoulder under the heavy beam, no doubt, many a time to assist Joseph, could be other than the day-laborer whom their natural eyes saw; hence they were scandalized that He should turn instructor to them. Little did they think when they slightly called Him "Jesus the Carpenter" that they were coining a phrase which in the years to come would express the wonderful possibilities of this humble Galilean preacher. Far from their conception was it that this Jesus was destined to take the rough timber of human life, and make thereof a temple which should be the habitation of God. They saw only the man, with the tradesman's hammer and the tradesman's hope.

ANOTHER conception which, in its day, held many in its grip was the opinion that Jesus was unlearned. Men were eager to indicate that He had never studied in the higher schools, and consequently must be far behind the scribes and others of His time. If this be so, why then should the whole world go mad over Him? Why should great multitudes follow Him from place to place, and hang upon His words? These were questions that persisted in coming up again and again; but in spite of all this, men followed Him, and as they listened, they felt the stirring of new impulses within their hearts.

And why? Because Jesus the unlearned was wise enough to know men, and He interpreted life in terms of spiritual values. "How much is a man better than a sheep?" Infinitely! If the shepherd would give his life to save a sheep that had wandered away, the Son of God would lay down His life for a man who had lost himself in sin!

There were others who, brushing this objection to one side, saw in Jesus a great Teacher. It mattered little to them how He came by His knowledge. The one thing that really did matter was that He "spoke as never man spake." Blind leaders of the blind had given them but little help; but here was One who "taught with authority, and not as the scribes." The truth, as He taught it and preached it, hurt like a surgeon's knife; but some there were, who, like Nicodemus, felt that here was "a teacher sent from God." The great difficulty with this, however, was that while they saw God through Him, they did not see God in Him; He was to them a teacher, not The Teacher.

Another conception, which can hardly be compared with these, was the one held by even some of the disciples, that He was destined to become a great national leader of men. They saw a throne in the City of David, and would have put a sword in the hand of Jesus had He said the word. Some of us wonder even yet what would have been the result had He given heed to them. Would a great world-empire have been established, or would He have been a failure? But whatever might have been the result, it did not seem to particularly interest Jesus, for He announced in no uncertain terms, "My kingdom is not of this world!" No matter what others might think, the glory of a throne, the pomp and pageantry of kingship held no attraction for Him. A crown of thorns was to be His diadem; but the world could not understand.

BUT now we come to a conception that is a great advance. One day as He was teaching, He said to His disciples, "What is the current opinion in the minds of men concerning me? Whom do men say that I am?" To this query there were several answers. Some thought He might be Elias, or Jeremias, or one of the other prophets, but it seemed the general opinion ran along this level. Even on this great day of His entry into Jerusalem, in response to the question, "Who is this?" the answer was given, "This is Jesus, the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee." And they were

Yes, the soul-stirring, vision-clarifying, life-ennobling conception is that King Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God!"

NOW, that we have learned what is the right conception, let us for a few moments return to the thought introduced at the beginning, the importance of a right conception of Christ. It is important, because:

First, what you think of Him determines all your thinking. Nothing in all the world will so quickly set a life right, as a right conception of Jesus Christ. Take the case of a man who had never given much time or attention to the deeper matters of the soul. Christ had been to him a stranger. In his dealings with his fellows, he had been grasping and hard. Everything this man ever did or failed to do might have been traced back to one great, underlying principle of his life—distrust of friends as well as enemies. And back of this was distrust of God. He spurned the Gospel and derided churches, largely because he felt distrustful toward those who represented these things.

But one day a miracle happened. Yes, a miracle. As he sat at his desk in his private office, he began for the first time in his life to think of the Man of Galilee. Stock-taking had been completed the day before, and the accountant had placed some very interesting and encouraging figures before him. Already he was looking ahead and making plans for another year; when a thought that had never troubled him before suddenly arose: "What if I don't live?" Then he recalled a Scripture he had heard when but a boy—the story of the rich fool. As he meditated upon this, his heart gradually softened. He felt that Jesus was right in His view of such a life. And that man left his place of business at the noon hour with a new conception and a profound love in his heart for the Son of Man, which so transformed his life that thereafter men were amazed at the things he did for others. Love and sympathy filled his heart, shutting out the old selfishness and indifference. He reorganized his business and all of his affairs according to the ethics of Jesus. He began to count it a joy to spend and be spent for the advancement of the Kingdom of God. And all because he had gotten the right conception of Jesus.

And this is not an isolated case by any means. It is the old story over and over again. The man who once gets a right conception of Jesus will from that day interpret life in terms of eternal values.

AND then your conception of Jesus determines your attitude toward Him. Now, when I say "your attitude toward Him," I wish to emphasize this, for there are many in this old world who have a very warm place in their hearts for Church work, and for religion as a whole; but they are not very pronounced in their conception of Jesus personally; consequently their attitude is such as to make it impossible for Jesus to "do any mighty works" for them.

Do you behold in Jesus the Teacher? Then He can teach you much that is profitable. The great national Leader? Then you must place Him alongside the other great leaders of the world. Does He appeal to you as a prophet? If so, you will do as some in His day did, place Him in the ranks with Isaiah and the others. And His teachings may stir your heart and fire your imagination, and you may be a better man than you would ever have been without this conception.

But all of this falls far short of the real mark? Jesus does not ask that you give Him recognition by calling Him "good" or "interesting" or "great prophet" or any of the hundred and one other things that might suggest themselves to men; He does not come to you and me that we may give Him a "character"; Oh, no! This Son of the Living God rides triumphantly, and even the little children cry, "Hosanna to Great David's greater Son!"

When we behold in Him the very Christ, then He does for us the work that the Christ of God, the Divine Redeemer, came into the world to do. If our conception is that He is in very truth the Saviour of the world, and if we are ready to accept Him as such in our hearts, then our attitude is such as makes it possible for Him to save.

Lastly, your conception and your acceptance determine your eternity. In other words, what you do with Jesus now decides your future forever. By this we are raised to the very heights, or we are cast down to the depths. We open the gates to eternal glory, or we consign our souls to endless night.

Who, then, is this Jesus? The question is not, where does He stand; but where do you stand? What does Jesus mean to you? WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Praise God, from Whom all Blessings Flow," or "Holy Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 46.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 239, first column.)

Sermon—"WHO IS THIS JESUS?"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"One Sweetly Solemn Thought" or "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name."

Benediction—Instruct us, O Thou great Teacher of all mankind, in more than human wisdom, and may the Word to which we have here today listened fall like good seed into our hearts, to spring up for refreshment in times of need, not only for our own hunger, but that we may help to feed the hungry soul of any who faint by the way. We ask it in Jesus' name. AMEN.

right, for Jesus was a prophet. How differently the history of the Jews might read today if they had even accepted Jesus as a Prophet. He would never have shed those tears over the city of His love and hopes. He need never have cried in anguish "ye would not, and so your house is left desolate!" Yes, He was a prophet; but He was more than a prophet.

And this brings us to that conception which began to gain ground as He neared the end of His earthly life, and has been gaining ground ever since. After the disciples had told Him of the opinions of men, He asks in a very pointed manner, "But whom say ye that I am?" And big-hearted Peter, with that impulse which was at the same time his best and his worst quality, rushes to the front and shouts so that all may hear, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God!"

We can almost see Peter's eye flash, and his hand go to the spot where a sword should hang, as if he would defend this statement even to the point of death. And Jesus puts His seal upon this conception by pronouncing it a "Divine Revelation." Therefore we have in these words the highest conception which man may entertain of Jesus. "The Christ, the Son of the Living God." Carpenter? Teacher? Yes! Leader? Without a doubt! Prophet? Most assuredly! But is this all? Why the hosannas of the children? Why the palm branches? Why the great multitude?

"Who is this Jesus, why should He
The city move so mightily?
A passing stranger, has he skill
To move the multitude at will?
In accents hushed the throng reply:
Jesus of Nazareth Passeth By!"

Which Is His Body

SUNDAY. Eph. 1:22. "The Church, which is His Body." It is a deeply solemn thought, and one quick with inspiration and hope, that the Spirit of the living Christ seeks reincarnation in the fellowship of those who believe in Him. In vital reality He would be embodied in the corporate life of our own day. His Spirit would be the breath and motive of all our movements, "the very pulse of the machine."

The Scriptural metaphor is no remote figure of speech, dimly hinting at the wonderful possibilities of the children of men. It is literally and scrupulously true. The Word is even now seeking to become flesh. The Divine Spirit is seeking and claiming human forms in which to manifest His truth and grace. And this mystic embodiment is to begin with His Church. The Church is to be the living Christ, what the human form of Jesus was two thousand years ago. The Church is to live Christ, to express Christ, to give Christ's Spirit visibility in human life and service. The features of its face are to be the lineaments of His countenance. Every line is to be a sign, and the sign is to be rich and weighty in divine significance. The Church is to be His body, and in the Church the world is to realize the presence of the Lord, and to feel the power of His virtue and grace.

It is an overwhelming claim, and even to whisper it seems a presumption. But nevertheless it is true, and the truth can make us free. The embodiment may be only partial, and this because the human surrender is mean. The Lord's consecration may be full while ours is only fragmentary and broken. There may be little or no room for Him in the inn. But, however incomplete is the embodiment, it is nevertheless most real. The grace of the Lord Jesus can be seen in His Church. His holiness may be seen in many a stalwart virtue. His love may be seen in countless campaigns of chivalry and eagerly accepted sacrifice. Christ's pity can be felt in its compassions. His Spirit, going out after that which is lost, can be seen in countless midnight quests, and in prolonged search upon the mountains. The Church has her failings, she has her reluctances, she has her petty meanesses, she is often wayward and indolent, and she has many sins; but whosoever will look frankly into her life, will find the Presence and the goings of the Son of God. He is embodied in countless fair and strong lines of character, and every virtuous feature is the shining of His face.

But our risen Lord is in His body, the Church, in order that through the Church He might become embodied in everything. That is the vast and majestic purpose of the Incarnation. He embodied Himself in humanity, in order that humanity might embody Him in every human interest. In the completed work of His passion everything is to be His body. His will is to be its pulse, His kindling love is to be its inspiration. Common labor is to be His body, just as all His own earthly labor was His Father's business. Daily work is to be directed by His Spirit, and all its counsels and purposes are to be drawn from His wisdom. Yes, the lines of labor are to reveal the countenance of the Lord.

An Act of Parliament or Congress is to be His body; it is to be Christ's act as well as ours, and it is to do His will on earth even as it is done in heaven.

Such is the process and progress of the Incarnation. It is the filling of earth's water-pots with heavenly wine. It is the seizure of all the forms and fashions of human activity, and so charging them with His Spirit that they vibrate with His life and express the riches of His truth and grace. Every time an old form receives a new spirit, and reflects the life of Jesus, His growing incarnation is manifested, and His kingdom comes. Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly!

Are we making room for Him? "If any man will open the door"—the door of anything, the door of the personal life, the door of the corporate life, the door of an action, the door of a custom or an institution—"I will come in." And this coming in is always a transformation. The house becomes a home, the body becomes a temple, even the temple of the Holy Ghost.

After Easter—What?

MONDAY. Luke 24:49. "But tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." The Book of Acts has never been finished; it is going right on. Men like Clement of Rome, Ignatius of Antioch, Savonarola, Luther, John Wesley and Carey Judson, have all added chapters to the history of the Christian Church. The beginnings, however, are found in the latter part of the Gospel according to Luke. He adds to his historic record a loving touch.

The Cross had failed to defeat and the tomb had failed to hold the conquering King. The decisive battle between heaven and hell was fought not in the wilderness with wild beasts but in the quiet tomb of Joseph of Arimathea.

The Resurrection of Jesus is the central fact of Christianity. The followers of Jesus, wherever found, are not marching in the train of a funeral cortege, but behind a chariot. The Church is not a widow but a bride.

The program is plain before us. It is not so much "Back to Christ" as "On to Christ!"

If we are really following Jesus we are on the move. He always gets us somewhere. That is quite contrary to the influence of the founders of the old-world religions. With them died the most of their power. But the supreme power of Jesus came when He did what the others could not do. The one thing that men have never conquered is death, and precisely because this is the truth, the Church has always demanded that the resurrection be tested. For truth is never so triumphant and glorious as when it has more evidence than it can possibly use.

But after Easter—what? Well, the first thing is to tarry for the power. After Easter, means anticipation of His return, but it means much more. It means the honest and earnest attempt to lay the world at His feet. And when the Bridegroom comes, we must not be afraid or ashamed to go forth to meet Him.

Counting God In

TUESDAY. Psalms 18:29. "For by Thee, I have run through a troop." Some of the expressions of the writer of these words seem almost like boastfulness. And when we stop for a moment and think of the act indicated here—breaking through an armed troop—well, as a single-handed feat, it comes pretty near to being impossible. But the writer does not say he did it alone. No, indeed! "By THEE have I broken through a troop!" In other words, he had counted God in.

Is not this the secret of success in all the battles of life? I often think of that day when the old Prophet of God was in the mountain alone with his servant, surrounded by the Syrian hosts. The young man saw nothing but the enemy, and defeat and destruction for his master and himself. "How shall we do?" But the man of God replied, "Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." And then the wonderful thing happened. Elisha prayed, and when the young man's eyes were opened, he saw not only the Syrians drawn up about the hill; but between the Prophet and the enemy he saw the "thin red line" of God's flaming chariots.

And it is ever the same. "He always wins who sides with God." It may be today that we shall hear the noise of battle, but tomorrow, "the victor's song." Man plus God is a magnitude for which the forces of unrighteousness have never yet found an equation.

Woman's Share in Redemptive Work

WEDNESDAY. John 20:18. "Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord." A woman was the first Gospel messenger of the resurrection, obeying the words, "Go and tell My brethren that I ascend to My Father and your Father." Woman, who has been coming to her own, after nineteen centuries of denial and retirement, may become the great evangel of the Christ. She may turn the tide of evil flowing from war, lust and crime back into its hellish source, and open the way for the River of Life to flow over all the earth.

O woman, thou who were last at the Cross and first at the sepulchre, you may sing the songs of redemption, tell its story from the platform, in the press, on the street and in the home, calling the world unto Him.

"Mary was the first to proclaim the finished work of redemption, the first of mortals to behold the glory of Easter morning? He Who stood before Mary stands before every one, saying, 'I am the first and the last; I am He that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore.'"

O Christian women of the whole world, the great Church of Christ salutes you, calls you, ordains you to go into all the world, proclaiming the risen Redeemer.

Among the successors of the group of resurrection women are many noble names, like Susannah Wesley, Queen Victoria, Florence Nightingale, Mrs. William Booth, Frances Willard and Harriet Beecher Stowe, as well as a mighty host of missionary women who have been speaking the words of truth and singing the song

"Tell it out among the weeping ones that Jesus lives, Tell it out among the weary ones what rest He gives, Tell it out among the sinners that He still receives."

A Voice in the Wilderness

THURSDAY. John 1:23. "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness." There have been many voices raised, like that of John the Baptist, in an endeavor to "make straight the way of the Lord." And many have been lonely and discouraged, because there seemed to be no response. It is one of the prices we pay in the work of pathfinding and pioneering. Have you never, failing to receive the co-operation of even your best friends, been tempted to ask "What is the use and the good of all this endeavor?" Yet you have not been so utterly alone as you imagine. If such a thought has come to you, let it comfort and cheer you to remember what has been ultimately accomplished for humanity by scores of lonely men and women, isolated, friendless, discouraged.

The solitary voice of the reformer may be heard only indistinctly by the men of his own generation. It may take years for the leaven of the truth to work. But work it will. All the power of God's universe is back of the word of truth and the life of love, no matter how unassuming be the lips that speak it or the life that leads it.

One of the finest things in the book of Revelation is that picture of Jesus Christ, the rider on a white horse, coming forth conquering and to conquer. Our faith, strengthened by the Scriptures in which are the promises of God, and by all history, in which we already see many promises fulfilled and vindicated, convince us of the ultimate triumph of righteousness on the earth. "Jesus shall reign!"

"'Tis coming up the steeps of time
And this old world is growing brighter,
We may not see the dawn sublime,
But high hopes make the heart throbs lighter.
We may be sleeping in the ground,
When it awakes the people's wonder,
But we have felt it gathering round
And heard its voice of living thunder—
Christ's reign! Ah, yes, it's coming."

The Seeing Heart

FRIDAY. Matt. 5:8. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Christ clearly intimates here that there is a quality of the heart which is closely connected with the faculty of perception. One of the greatest of earth's philosophers held that the perception of truth is always a moral act rather than a mental exercise. Why does a child see so much more than an adult? A child misses nothing. There was a boy who, being reproached by his father for inattention to a sermon, repeated the text, related the points of the sermon, and then remarked, "I heard the sermon, every word, and I counted the timbers in the roof of the tabernacle while I listened!" You may say it is because the child's mind is curious. No; it is because the child's mind is still unspoiled. He has his gift of wonder fresh from God. We lose that gift, lose its acuteness all too soon.

There is a gift of Christ which acts in conjunction with moral judgment much as a telescope acts in conjunction with the eye. There is an understanding of the heart. The apostle speaks of having the eyes of our understanding enlightened. The Revised Version changes the phrase and speaks of "the eyes of the heart" being enlightened. This is not strange. There is an understanding of the heart, which, so far as moral truth is concerned, is much more dependable than the understanding of the mind. "The natural man discerneth not the things of the spirit"—because the things of the spirit are discerned by the heart, the pure heart, the tender heart, the believing heart.

Growing Toward God

SATURDAY. II Peter, 3:18. "Grow in grace." Minerva is said to have leaped full armed from the forehead of Jove; but no Christian is born that way. Character is a development under the influence of the Holy Spirit. No one is a true Christian who is not growing better every day. He may not be conscious of it. He may even lament that he is "living at a poor, dying rate"; but grow he must. He can not stand still. Living is growing. Following Christ is moving on.

The sea gulls in the wake of a steamer that is making thirty knots an hour seem to poise on motionless wings; nevertheless, though noiselessly and inconspicuously, they are keeping pace with the ship. So does the humblest Christian advance in his spiritual life; and the fact that he mourns his imperfection, and is ambitious to "fly up the heavenly way," is proof presumptive of his growing toward God.

Of Special Interest to the Home-Maker

Conducted by MARIE LYNDALL DARRACH

Using Eggs More Freely

SINCE eggs are becoming cheaper, after a period of several months when their high price has made it impossible to use them freely, there is the tendency on the part of all housekeepers to put more egg dishes on the daily menu. They may be used satisfactorily for other meals beside breakfast, although there seems to be the idea that they are most appropriate for the morning. The simpler forms belong to breakfast, of course, as boiled, poached, shirred or scrambled or an occasional omelet or fried egg. But variations of these fit well into the remaining meals.

Plain poached eggs may be used with seasoned, well thickened tomatoes served on toast, or with spaghetti and tomato sauce made rather thick and served without toast. Again, creamed potatoes, if diced small and made with thick milk gravy, may be re-enforced by poached eggs with or without a sprinkling of grated cheese or garnish of tiny strips of bacon or split sausages. Thick creamed onions are also especially good when served with poached eggs and mashed potatoes.

Variations of shirred eggs are especially useful when it comes to the utilization of left-overs. There may not be enough left-over chicken, veal, ham or fish for the meal. Just cream the meat as usual, place the mixture in a medium-sized baking dish and a few minutes before time to serve luncheon or dinner set it in the oven and when it is heated through, break over the top an egg for each person and dust the eggs with salt and pepper. Allow the dish to remain in the oven till the eggs have solidified—about fifteen minutes.

Any creamed vegetable may be used instead of the meat. Or to make a complete "one-dish meal" line a good-sized casserole with cooked spaghetti, rice or mashed potato, fill in the center with the creamed vegetable meat or fish; heat and break the eggs over the top as directed, cooking them till firm in the oven.

The Children's Diet

WITH the coming of spring there is always the question of regulating the diet of the younger children of the family, and in a large household where the mother is busy the matter of providing proper food for the child under six years old without complicating the family menu or of having to provide practically an extra meal a day is always a problem to be carefully thought out.

Where the entire family breakfasts about seven o'clock the young child can take this meal with the others and should have the juice of one orange, a baked apple or stewed prunes, cereal with milk and one teaspoonful of sugar, a glass of milk, bread or toast with butter and an egg. At half-past ten the child should be given a glass of milk and bread. About one o'clock or at the hour when the family has lunch, the child should be given its heartiest meal. This should consist of broths or soups of any kind, vegetables, baked or mashed potato and bread and butter and stewed fruit or pudding or custard. Or the meal could be made up of chicken or meat, vegetables, baked or mashed potato, bread and butter and cookies.

The evening meal should be at half-past five and be composed of cereal with milk and sugar or milk toast or thick soup—or an egg if one was not eaten in the morning; cocoa made with milk, or a glass of milk, bread and butter and stewed fruit.

Hot Sandwiches

A HOT sandwich is a very different thing from the thin dainty article that one makes for picnics or tea. The club sandwich is the hearty one. A thin slice of cold roast pork is a good substitute for chicken and very thin slices of cooked sausage meat, laid on a lettuce leaf and covered with a thinly sliced piece of tomato—even from a can—provide a delicious Club sandwich.

Hot roastbeef and hot ham spread on buttered bread make a substantial meal. For a hot ham sandwich, mince odds and ends of left-over ham, including some fat, season one cupful with one to two teaspoonfuls of prepared mustard. Spread on slices of buttered bread, press together and cut in oblong squares. Dip these in a mixture made of one slightly beaten egg, one cupful of milk, one-half teaspoonful of salt and a little pepper. Fry quickly to a rich brown on both sides in a little melted fat. Lay on a platter and serve hot.

A salad of shredded cabbage and apple with mayonnaise and one tablespoonful of catchup can be served with these sandwiches, which are hearty enough for an evening meal.

Worth-While Recipes

SPANISH HASH

CHOP finely four cold boiled potatoes, two onions and one green pepper. To this add one cupful of cold chopped meat and one cupful of tomato pulp. Season with salt, pepper and three drops of tabasco sauce, adding one well-beaten egg. Drop by spoonful into greased muffin rings and bake until firm.

RAISIN BREAD

The sponge is made by dissolving a cake of compressed yeast and one tablespoonful of sugar in one-half cupful of lukewarm water. To one cupful of scalded milk add one cupful of hot water and when lukewarm add the yeast and two cupfuls of white flour and beat for five minutes. Let rise until very light. Then add three tablespoonfuls each of sugar and butter creamed together, one teaspoonful of salt and one and one-half cupfuls of seeded raisins. Stir in the flour until the dough is smooth, using six or eight cupfuls of flour. Cover to let rise, and when light bake about one hour.

CODFISH BALLS

Two cupfuls of potatoes pared and cubed; one cupful of salted codfish, one egg, and one teaspoonful of butter substitute. Wash and shred the codfish and boil with the potatoes until the potatoes are soft. Drain thoroughly and mash well. Add the remaining ingredients. Beat all together. Shape and fry in hot fat.

EGGLESS MUFFINS

One cupful of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one tablespoonful of sugar (some people prefer none) one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, one-half cupful of milk, two teaspoonfuls of melted butter substitute. Sift the flour with the dry ingredients and stir the milk gradually into the mixture. Add the melted butter substitute, stir quickly and pour into greased muffin pans. Bake in a moderate oven for about twenty minutes.

STUFFED BEEF HEART

Wash the heart and remove the veins and arteries. Stuff with dressing made of rice, and sew or tie. Roll in flour, sprinkle with salt and brown in hot fat. Place in casserole, add water to half cover and cook slowly for two hours. Turn once or twice during the cooking. When done thicken the liquid and season for gravy.

TOMATO TIDBITS

Wash a cupful of rice, and dry on the stove. Fry in hot lard until brown, and stir in one finely chopped onion. Fry ten minutes. Next add a tablespoonful of tomato paste, chopped garlic, pepper and salt and chopped parsley. Cover with hot water. Cook slowly without stirring. Sausages cut in small squares or small pieces of chicken gilet may be added.

The Home Mail-Bag

To the Home Editor:

I have a recipe for batter bread that I feel sure some of your readers will find useful as well as economical. One and one-half cupfuls of corn meal, butter one-half the size of an egg, and salt to taste. Cream these ingredients together, add one quart of milk and three eggs and cook in a baking dish.

Bernardsville, N. J.

V. N. D.

To the Home Editor:

My family is very fond of dumplings with stews and fricassée chicken, and to vary from the usual dumpling, when I have a chicken fricassée, I make the ordinary baking powder biscuit, cut a little larger than if it were to be used for hot bread. I split these in two and arrange the pieces around the platter and then pour the gravy over them. They are an excellent substitute for dumplings.

Milton, Mass.

MARY S. PETERS.

To the Home Editor:

Having tried so many of your useful recipes with success I am sending one that I have used for a long time. It is called "hygienic salad dressing" and people who dislike a great deal of oil find it just right in flavor. To one-half cupful of vinegar I add one-quarter cupful of water and heat. Then take one-half cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful each of mustard and cornstarch and two-thirds of a teaspoonful of salt. Mix these dry ingredients thoroughly and pour into it the heated vinegar and water. Stir it well while it is coming to a boil.

Household Hints

PASTE the oilcloth on the kitchen table instead of tacking it and the oilcloth will wear longer, as it cannot move and wrinkle when wiped, and it does not crack.

To restore the color to ivory handled knives after they have become yellow, rub them with fine emery or sand paper. This will make them white and take out the spots.

Instead of using starch for curtains or other sheer material, add a teaspoonful of borax to each gallon of rinsing water. The curtains will be easy to iron and will not have the cloudy appearance given by starch.

To clean wooden ware, wash in hot soapy water and dry thoroughly. Never dry near the fire as excessive heat will crack the wood.

Do not use new a brass kettle until it has been cleansed with salt and vinegar.

Silk stockings in which a thread has been dropped may be mended by the use of a fine crochet hook. Pick up the dropped stitch and continue crocheting all along the unravelled part. Care must be taken to pick up every thread as you work along the length of the stocking. Fasten the last stitch securely with a needle and thread.

Wool that has been knitted and ripped out may be made to look like new if treated as follows: Place a towel in a colander; nest the yarn on the towel and cover with the ends of the towel. Place all over a kettle of hot water and steam until it is fluffy.

When Easter Lifts Her Lily Face

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN Easter lifts her lily face,
And smiles into the sun;
I feel the hopes of other days,
Grow flower-like, one by one,
Until the joyous azure skies,
Seem singing down to me,
The gladness of the Master's love,
And springtime's mystery.

When Easter lifts her lily face,
My sorrows pass away,
As lightly as the stone that rolled,
From where the Saviour lay!
And as the tender grasses leap,
From winter's frozen sod,
I feel again, past fear and pain,
The boundless love of God!

When Easter lifts her lily face,
I want to laugh aloud,
And all at once I see the glow,
Of silver in each cloud,
I feel new life in every breeze—
In every budding tree—
And through the gleam of Springtime's dream, God's face smiles down on me!

as of Famine Relief

FROM Z. Charles Beals, of Hoehow, China, treasurer of the Christian Herald Famine Fund in China, come two heart-interest stories of rescues accomplished as the result of the contributions of Christian Herald readers. They illustrate dramatically conditions in the famine district.

The first story is told in the words of Miss A. M. Hancock, who received a grant from the Christian Herald fund for relief work for children at Kuang Ping Hsien, Chihli:

"Lien-rong came to us, as did our other girl refugees, to escape certain starvation and the danger of being sold into slavery. During the first four months of her stay with us, I did not observe anything special about her except her intense listening in meetings and at Bible lessons and her good memory for all that had been preached or taught. Her awful test came just after our happy Christmas, which we observed with song and joy, but with our ordinary food, remembering the starving about us. Lien-rong's brother came to say that the mother was very ill, perhaps dying, and was asking to see her daughter. If it had been one of the other girls I might have suspected danger, but we knew this family a little. On leaving, the girl clung to me and cried. I supposed that it was because her people were starving, and gave her a little money to take with her. Afterward I asked of our helper, Mr. Giang, 'Do you suppose that mother is starving to death?' He replied, in his positive way, 'I will find out.'

"A heavy snowstorm came on which made the eight miles of road to that village impassable for about four days. In the meantime we were very busy with many calls of suffering all about. Many died in that cold spell. When the road was at last passable and the girl had not returned, we began to make inquiry and then we discovered that we had been deceived, that the mother was not ill, that they wished to get the girl home to sell her. They were terribly poor, had sold their little bit of land (a fraction of an acre), and even their bedding and warm clothes, had been living on leaves of trees and chaff, and had for some time been borrowing money on the girl and waiting their opportunity to sell her. My heart sank when I heard that three days before Lien-rong had been taken to the railroad thirty miles away. Humanly speaking, the case seemed hopeless.

"We grasped our little hold upon the case, which seemed to be no hold at all. We seized the old, ragged, starving father, who had come to market to sell a few nails, and made him our willing prisoner by giving him plenty of hot food, a little fire and a bed cover for the night. Then we represented the case to the official who told us what we knew already; that if the parents had sold the girl, there was no law against it. However, he offered to help us by sending for the man and telling him what he thought of him. The father was too ignorant to distinguish between an official and a non-official reproof, and too scared to do otherwise than help us to get the girl back. He declared that it was his wife and her brother who were selling the girl and that he had opposed it. This changed the situation; the sale was unlawful, if his story was true.

"With solemn sense of responsibility for wise and quick action, three of us—Mr. Giang, Mr. Ch'en and I—knelt in prayer for guidance. It came suddenly to Mr. Ch'en that he should go in search of the girl. Mr. Giang and I also felt that this was the Lord's guidance. So he went, taking the girl's brother for his guide.

"Three days later Mr. Ch'en returned bringing the girl. There was great joy in all our hearts. The girls gathered around her and began to sing, 'Jesus loves me, this I know.' Lien-rong joining heartily in the singing.

"But her part of the story is the best. While we were unaware of her danger, she was being put to the test. Could she pray the effectual prayer for her own deliverance? Yes, she did, and the answer came about through outward circumstances which after all are not so strange, but which seemed impossible at the time. First, the awful traffic in girls in this famine district had been overdone and the market was overstocked. Then the heavy snow had made it impossible for them to take her for a few days. The third circumstance was that her childish faith together with her Christian scruples confused the 'middlemen' employed to find a buyer for her. They did not know quite how to handle a girl who talked of repentance for sin and of faith in God, Who would judge sin. Her faith that she would be delivered caused fear. So it came to pass that when Mr. Ch'en reached the place of Lien-rong's confinement, unarmed and without any legal claim, they were so afraid that they turned her over unconditionally to him. So her prayer was answered and she is among us now."

How Christian Herald Readers Made Possible Two Rescues

THE other story is that of a Chinese boy hero, and is related by Mrs. Edith M. Clark, who received a grant of $5,000 for refuge work among women and children in Wuan Hsien, Honan:

"They stood in the big covered gateway through which the raw evening wind blew, piercing their thin cotton rags and making their teeth chatter. Outside the ground was white with snow.

"The mother was holding to her breast a half-naked baby, almost perished with the cold; and the youngest child, a boy of ten, carried his three-year-old sister in poor bony arms not wholly covered with a torn blouse. They made no moan or outcry; even the babies were quiet, too numbed with cold and hunger, to whimper.

"One glance told me that the boy was very ill, his ashen face and gasping breath made it apparent that he was on the point of collapse. And the tiny girl he carried—how could anyone so thin be alive?

"My questions disclosed that they lived at the mouth of a mine, thirteen miles distant in the mountains, had been starving at home and had heard we were saving poor people. They had been walking all day. I looked at them, at their worn shoes, at the snow on the ground and then at the ghastly face of the sick boy and wondered how he could have walked even one yard. The little sister was too weak to stand. Was it possible he had carried her for thirteen miles! The mother explained that the father had fallen down the mine and hurt his leg, so that he had been in bed unable to walk for months, and the family was about to die. The boy had been sick for two months due to standing in the water in the mine, handing up buckets. So they came in and were warmed and fed and clothed. How glad I was to have food to give them.

"Did not your hearts thrill when you read of some wounded soldier on the battle field, bearing an injured comrade to safety? This little boy was suffering from a very bad type of dysentery which had been sapping his strength for months, he was so swollen with dropsy that breathing was difficult. Yet he had staggered all day, over rocky roads, covered with snow, bearing his little sister to where he hoped she might find food.

"The little hero was put to bed and cared for, and now six weeks later he is just beginning to go about and gain strength. The wee girl was so nearly dead that only the best care would give her any chance of life so I took her into my home and nursed her till now she is fat and merry, playing and singing about the house. The father too has had his wounds dressed and is up and able to walk again; and his wife and baby are in our mother's shelter.

"Just one family saved and restored to health; but there are hundreds of such around the mouth of those coal mines, and we have not enough money to save them."

CONTRIBUTIONS to the Christian Herald fund announced in our last issue aggregated $482,529.13. For the week just closed the daily receipts were:

Mission Notes

MORE than a thousand American doctors will be needed on the mission field during the next four years, and half of that number should be ready to go out at once.

"IF WE do not possess the land immediately, it is easy to see what will happen," writes a missionary from Central Africa. "Mohammedan fullahs are already establishing themselves in the villages as spiritual advisors of the people."

AGRICULTURAL education still has a long way to go in some parts of Burmah, where the established method of plowing is to stampede a herd of buffaloes across a wet field. When the ground is sufficiently cut up, seeding begins. But Baptist missionaries say that even there education is beginning to introduce a spirit of progress.

Science finds more valuable growth and health elements in Yeast than in milk.

Magic Yeast—Yeast Foam
—just the same except in name, 10c

Important new facts that everyone — every mother particularly — ought to know

IF YOU are one of the many parents who have well-fed but undernourished children you may find Yeast Foam a valuable addition to the foods in your home.

Nutrition experts learn new facts

Only a few years ago Casimer Funk, nutrition expert, discovered that there was a mysterious but valuable substance in food which he called "vitamine," from the Latin word "vita," meaning life. A little later another scientist, McCollum, proved that a certain vitamine was necessary for growth, that this vital element must be present in the diet regardless of the combinations of food eaten, otherwise the child would not grow normally or the mature person be healthy and strong.

It isn't the amount of food children eat that counts

A child might be fed all the food it needed, craved, or had appetite for, but it would not grow unless it had enough growth vitamins, possessed by some green and leafy foods, present in the hulls and hearts of wheat, corn, rice and other grains, but refined away by the process of manufacture.

Growth vitamins many times more plentiful in yeast than in milk

That yeast is more abundant in the growth vitamine than milk has been conclusively demonstrated by some of the country's leading scientific men, notably Osborne and Mendel of Yale University. Yeast, therefore, when eaten as a food supplies in even much greater quantities than milk the necessary growth vitamine which children do not get in most other foods.

Yeast also improves appetite

That yeast stimulates the appetite has been proved by tests upon young animals. When large amounts of milk were replaced by small amounts of yeast, not only the normal rate of growth was maintained, but more food was desired and additional food actually eaten.

Keener appetite, better health, increased weight, result from adding yeast to the diet, because of the extraordinary power of yeast to assist the body in better and more thorough assimilation of other foods eaten.

The best ways to take Yeast Foam

Many mothers crush a cake of yeast with a rolling pin and mix it with cereal after it is cooked.

Some eat it buttered like a cracker. Others prefer to take a bite of yeast cake and a bite of cracker without butter.

Many eat the cake plain and wash it down with a little water or milk.

Things to know about yeast

Yeast is not a drug. It is a marvelous and minute plant.

Yeast contains four times as much of the essential vitamine as spinach.

The yeast you eat is the same familiar cake of Yeast Foam used to make such exceptionally good bread in millions of homes.

It does not have the same effect in the body as in raising bread.

The Ideal Christian

International Sunday-School Lesson for April 3
Romans 12:1, 2, 9-21

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

DURING the present quarter the lessons will not follow a life, history or book. The general theme will be "Some Social Teachings of the Bible." Twice since the Improved Uniform Lessons were introduced by the International Lessons Committee topical lessons have been studied for a quarter or more. Beginning with July the lessons studies for six months will be "Life and Letters of Paul."

Topical lessons require even more biblical research and teachers will lead their classes in making the largest use of the Bible, finding facts both new and old therein. These lessons also require the teaching rather than the lecture method of presentation since the class, whether of younger or older students, should be encouraged to discuss the various subjects that are presented each week. There is very free discussion outside of the class; and why not have directed conversation in connection with these most important lesson topics?

The subject "The Ideal Christian" is really an introduction to the lessons that follow. Look carefully at the subjects which will be used until the end of June. For this purpose use your quarterly. These lesson studies in the Christian Herald are intended to supplement the information found in the lesson helps provided by the individual Sunday school and it is not the purpose to give an exposition of the lesson text. Always read the Daily Bible Readings each day. They are indicated in your quarterly. Plan additional Bible readings for your classes, if you are a teacher, and be particular to do all that you ask of your scholars.

There is a little danger in the subject. The ideal Christian does not exist and never will. Holiness and perfection come when we reach heaven. We can grow into the likeness of Jesus but never attain the ideal till we meet Him face to face on the other side of the Judgment seat.

The ideal Christian cannot be portrayed by an composite picture of good men and women. Jesus is the only ideal. Men are ever making mistakes by making the good the enemy of the best. But many people do make individuals their standards for living. Young people especially do this in their well-known years of hero worship. The Sunday-school teacher is frequently the ideal Christian of the pupil. What the teacher does becomes a standard. Most teachers show that at every cost they are following close to the Christ. Other teachers should resign their classes or omit those things which will lead their classes away from the Christ. A good definition of fasting is giving up anything that will hurt your influence.

READ the lesson text again and also such related reference material as the Sermon on the Mount (at least Matt. 5:1-16). Give attention to each sentence as you would in reading one of the Proverbs. Stop at each period and think. Thinking is hard work and there is too little of it in connection with Bible study. It is easier to read what some one else writes and agree or else forget. In the current lesson every sentence and even each phrase furnishes a standard to be used as a personal plumb line in individual character study. The exhortations are positive and not merely neutral or negative. These ideals are not only essential elements in character but they must find expression in acts for the benefit of others.

Most important of all is how the Christian life originates. Some twentieth century leaders think of Christianity as a process of education. There has been no change, in fact, from the first century teaching, which is clearly expressed in Christ's words to Nicodemus: "Ye must be born anew." Paul was still talking of essentials when he said "Christ in you, the hope of glory." People are building on sand when they neglect what Paul wrote to the Romans, "And be not fashioned according to this world." The root truth was presented when he said "but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." It is even more than a change of mind, it is a change of heart. A Christian is one in whom Jesus Christ is incarnated.

There must be the new life, the actual being a child of God, before there can be any approach to the ideal Christian. Only by the power of the Triune God can anyone live out the teachings given in commands found in the lesson text. And if one is a Christian he is seeking by life, prayer and direct appeal to lead others to a saving knowledge of the Christ, Who is the only standard for anyone. In applying this lesson give the chief place to settling the relationship to Christ as a Saviour. Many declared for Christ on Easter Sunday but there are many others who did not thus enlist as followers of Him. After this matter is settled then begin to build up the Christian character as expressed in the many teachings in the individual sentences of the text. The individual life must be given to our Lord and then it must be kept clean. This is a life job worthy of the best in the strongest person. It is a supreme task to live up to your name—Christian.

SOCIETY can be no better than the units. You are an essential unit. Know thyself. Boards of Health recently have been greatly concerned in preventing the spread of typhus fever. Their efforts are especially with the individual. One immigrant or other infested or infected person can harm a whole community. Individual Christians went to India, China, Africa, and other lands, and now there are increasing millions of followers in those and other countries because they lived His life and taught it to others. The ideal Christian is ever a propagandist. Other lessons in this quarter are "Making the Neighborhood Christian," "Making the Nation Christian," "Making the World Christian." Christianity, as Dr. James Stalker writes, is not only an insurance for the next world but a program for this life.

A definition of the Sunday school is closely related to the ideal Christian. It is to win souls to Christ, build them up in Christ and send them out to work for Christ. So with the Christian. There must first be the actual beginning of that life, then there must be individual growth followed by personal work which is as nearly world-wide as possible. "Take root downward, and bear fruit upward," Isa. 37:31.

Rapid progress is being made in making the standards of the Bible the ideals of society. Laws are more and more in accord with the principles of Divine equity. The needs of others impel to sharing and to go far beyond the work of "communicating to the necessity of the saints." Need anywhere is a call to give. Those who have injured the world are helped to re-establish themselves. Sympathy and kindness replace rendering evil for evil, and evil is overcome with good. To do these things becomes an obligation by reason of the "mercies of God" which have been so bountifully received. A fine illustration is found in the life of Paul. He lived out his own teachings, even as the Sunday-school teacher, and in fact every other Christian who would teach must do.

A familiar desk sign is "Do It Now." We know what is right and also what we ought to do. Jesus said, as the Golden Text states, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." The world loses much because right thoughts and good intentions do not result in actions. The ideal Christian will do it now.

25,000 Words Frequently Mispronounced

There Are 25,000 Chances for You to Make Yourself Lucid in the Pronunciation of English Words

And yet the man or woman of good breeding cannot afford to take a single one of them.

You should be familiar with the proper pronunciation of these 25,000 tricky words and be ever on your guard against misusing them.

Speech occupies so important a place in the society, business and professional life of our day that its intensive study is practically becoming the hobby of all intelligent citizens.

Slipshod and incorrect pronunciation is taken as a sure sign of careless and indifferent breeding.

A Blunt Mispronunciation of One Important Word May—

Spoil the charm of your conversation—Ruin a good speech—Make a lecture ludicrous—Destroy the power of a sermon—Discount a sales talk—Lessen the prestige of a teacher, and invite derision and discomfiture.

Your train of thought may be valuable and interesting—your grammar may be correct—your appearance faultless—but you destroy the effect of all these if your spoken English is shabby and imperfect.

You may avoid all this by obtaining the new volume.

Turn Once Again to Your First Love—that Good Old Serge!

TODAY—when you feel a little uncertain about values in men's suits—today is the very time to protect yourself by turning to a fabric that you know from experience will give the longest life of good looks.

And you know Blue Serge! Remember how well each serge suit you've had has worn? Remember how it kept its shape, how it held its creases, how well it looked on all occasions, and how often you thought "This suit has certainly given me my money's worth."

It wasn't accidental—it was the fabric! Serge is just the properly balanced combination of worsted yarns, compactly woven, and specially treated after weaving, to give it the utmost enduring qualities.

Now it happens that the makers of Clothcraft Clothes, realizing how puzzled is the clothing buyer today, and knowing the success of Clothcraft Serges in the past, have put even greater endeavor this season into the making of Clothcraft "Serge Specials."

The result is a series of Serge Specials which may justly be acclaimed as the best values for the money in the entire country.

—they are good style—the kind of style a man likes to wear, with none of the fads and frills which so often hide cheap tailoring and cheaper fabrics.—they wear unusually well—you may confidently expect them to outlive suits bought whole months before.

And the best part of it is that Clothcraft, because of savings resulting from purchases of raw materials in enormous quantities and because of specialized manufacturing processes, is actually able to sell these Serge Specials through retailers at prices astonishingly low.

In your moment of doubt turn to your first love—and get a Clothcraft Serge Special—tested by over a half million wearers.

JUST WHERE
SAVINGS

THE specialized manufacturing processes suggested above are in reality unique in the clothing business—developed by Clothcraft to make a better finished product for less cost.

Just for example, consider the sewing-in of sleeves, usually a costly hand process. Clothcraft uses a specially made machine that acts almost human—it has a cylindrical base that enables the operator to distribute the fullness more accurately than on a flat bed; thus it speeds up the work and saves "overhead."

Then again, in the making of pockets two costly operations are eliminated. The operator uses a machine with a double needle and an automatic knife that trims as the needles sew. This not only makes a better pocket but saves costly time.

These are only two of the score or more notable "short-cuts of manufacturing" which in the Clothcraft plant lead to savings. And these savings, as noted above, are passed on to you in the form of better suits at prices you can afford to pay.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6 1/4 per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107 1/2 per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent. are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co. 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Concerning the Little Tragedies

JUST yesterday I received a letter which I am reprinting, word for word. It is a pathetic little letter—and an exceedingly personal one—so I will omit the writer's name.

"I will first apologize," it said simply, "for addressing you. But after apologizing I must tell you of something that I have had on my mind for a long time.

"I am practically deaf, and I have thought that perhaps a word written by you might emphasize the duty that folk owe to their friends who can not hear. I say duty that folk 'owe.' I do not mean just that. I mean duty that thoughtful people are glad to perform. Thoughtful people do not call kindness a duty.

"Folk so often hold conversations near me, and I never hear them unless they remember to raise their voices. Sometimes I ask a question and they make some brief reply and turn and talk to others while I do not know whether they are still on the same subject or not. I am also denied the comfort and blessing of church services.

"My friends could help me out in many ways, if they only realized that I need help. They think that I can understand by seeing, and lip motion—which does aid me a little. But I can not understand a great deal that way, and if they only realized they could do so much, so very much!

"And so, if I am not discourteous to ask it, may I suggest that you write something on the subject? It is not for myself, alone, that I ask it—not at all—but for the good it may do others who are afflicted as I am! I am just suggesting that you write about the little things; like speaking a bit louder, and enunciating more clearly, and not leaving sentences, and thoughts, unfinished. I am only suggesting that you remind people of the things that they will be glad to remember."

Just yesterday I received the letter. And as I was opening the rest of my mail—and thinking, almost subconsciously, about my deaf pen-and-ink friend I came upon another letter that fitted my into thought. This is the other letter:

"Recently I was called to another state by illness, and was in a home where there is a young man entirely blind. He is brave and cheerful now, apparently, but when he asked his mother to show me a letter—that had been written to him when the first awful truth came to him that he was going blind—I knew that his cheerfulness must be at least partially assumed. The letter was from a girl friend and was very sweet and modest, but full of faith and trust and the goodness of our Father. I copied the letter to bring home with me, but have lost it in some way—I intended sending it to you with the wish that you would make a helpful, hopeful story of it. As I said before, it seemed to me that much of the young man's cheerfulness was assumed—and I could see that the girl's letter meant a great deal to him. When I asked him if he would let me read it for a second time he said: 'Yes, do! By all means. It's worth reading over and over!'

Two Letters Which Carry a Real Message for Thoughtless Persons

"The girl wrote very simply, quite as a sister might have written. I could tell that her interest was wholly in the young man's better nature—I could tell that she was urging him, in the most subtle way, to reach out to God. There was a high, uplifted tone in everything that she wrote—there was a fine spirit between the lines. I am sure that her letter, the act of a kind, thoughtful heart, will do more to help him in his trouble than anything else will do!"

TWO letters—rather alike in some ways, and yet very different! Two letters that carry a real message to people who have, perhaps, not been thoughtful enough. Two letters that are as sincere as letters can be. My mail holds many such letters!

The first woman writes as the central figure in a tragedy—not a great, world-stirring, intense tragedy, but a small thing that goes on ceaselessly with its small heartaches and its small discouragements. She writes from her very soul, from her isolated position—for those who are cut off from the rest of the world by some infirmity dwell in a lonely land! She writes of tiny disappointments—of questions that are never answered, of sentences that are never finished, of sermons that she can not understand. She writes of the beautiful sounds that are denied her—the music of a church service, and the song of a bird, and the wind in the pine trees.

The second woman writes as an onlooker. She writes as an audience; as one who has watched a small human tragedy play its way out. And she, too, writes sympathetically, from the depths of her soul. The second woman is one who would never forget to speak loudly and distinctly to a person afflicted with deafness, she is like the girl she writes about, for I am sure that she would be the first to send a note of hopefulness and cheer to one who was sadly in need of it.

There are a great many people in the world who are like the second woman and the girl she tells about. There are a great many people who are going out of their way, every hour, to make easier the path that some one else must tread—who are always eager and ready to extend the hand of fellowship and love. There are letters that come to me very casually, in nearly every mail, from folk who belong in this class—and who have never given the matter a thought because doing good comes so naturally to them. And these people are not the ones that the first woman spoke of—they are not the ones who need to read this article.

No, it is for the people who are forgetful—who neglect the little things because they are thoughtless rather than unkind—that I am writing this. It is for them that I am quoting the two letters. Because I know that they would go out of their way to pay small attentions to folk less fortunate than they—if they realized how much these attentions meant. It's only that they do not realize!

ONE very dear to me was blind for the last years of her life. She could distinguish objects darkly, as through a heavy fog, but she could not see to read—and reading had been her chiefest pleasure. And so I used to take a few hours of my time, every day, to read to her.

The few hours meant very little to me—very little, indeed. But as time went on I could see how very much they meant to her. And perhaps, because I could realize how much they meant, I am kinder to others who are in her position than I might otherwise have been. If I had never come closely in contact with blindness I could never have appreciated the pity and sadness of it.

And that is the real reason why so many people are thoughtless. They do not appreciate the real unhappiness that comes with an infirmity. They have never been closely in contact with any one who is a sufferer, they do not understand—for they have had no way of knowing what such suffering really means.

I hope that some of these people who do not understand will read the two letters that I have reprinted. And I hope that they will realize why they have been reprinted. And I hope, most of all, that the realization will make them a trifle tenderer—a shade more considerate.

For, if I can know that the two letters have helped even one thoughtless person on the road to understanding, I will feel that they have fulfilled a very great mission. And I will feel that they have helped make the world just a little kinder—and more than a little better!

Young People's Topic for April 3

furnishing of the temple, and to develop an esthetic taste for the sublime and beautiful; but when piety interferes with pity, possessions are placed above persons, oaken pews are more dear than broken penitents, and carpets more important than consecration, then there is manifested a form of idol worship no less sinful than the practice of the heathen who postures and genuflects before his shapes of wood and stone.

The real Church is a group of men and women endowed with the Spirit of Jesus Christ, busy here and there, touching their environments with the leaven of their influence and the salt of their Gospel which prevents corruption. Christianity includes the entire relationship of our lives, domestic and social, commercial and political, public and private. The Church is that group of "two or three gathered together" in the name of Jesus Christ, or of a host numbering into the thousands, changing the moral climate where they live, regenerating lives and institutions, working a program that is helpful, constructive, inspiring, laboring for the greatest good to the greatest number in harmony with the teachings of Jesus Christ. Such a program takes the Church out of a building into the four corners of the community. Such an ideal removes the Church from the sphere of a narrow denominationalism and carries the values of the Kingdom of God into every realm of thought and action.

The theme is illustrated by the story of the circuit rider who had but one sermon. His text was: "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Jesus Christ." Wherever he went he preached that sermon. One who knew him well said, "I think you are a very good man and that you have a very good sermon, for, wherever you go, you are not ashamed of the Gospel of Jesus Christ." The way to make the Kingdom come in our community is to stand up for Jesus Christ whenever we have the opportunity and wherever we find ourselves. In other words, Christianity is a between-Sunday task, the divine service field on the Sabbath being only a preparation for the divine service that needs to be done every day. "Ye are my witnesses." "Go ye into all the world." Our commission includes the highways and byways of our pilgrimage through life. It comes as a challenge and an opportunity to express ourselves in the highest terms in behalf of all.

How I Solved the Clothes Problem For Our Family

A personal experience

By Mrs. R. H. Miller, 6 Evergreen Ave., Middletown, Conn.

LESS than a year ago, when our whole family needed clothes at once, I was discouraged. There are five of us, my husband, three children less than ten years old, and myself. My husband is in the Postal Service, and our expenses had increased so rapidly without a corresponding increase in our income that a new wardrobe for every member of the household was a very serious problem. There were no two ways of looking at it—we simply had to have clothes! But we couldn't imagine where the money was coming from.

Then, almost by accident, I discovered a plan that not only provided us with all the clothes we needed, but showed me the way to turn my spare moments at home into money—more than I had ever expected to make. Altogether this has meant so much to us that I am sure other women will be interested in hearing about it.

One night I read in a magazine the story of a woman who had learned at home in spare time through the Woman's Institute to make for herself at great savings, just the kind of dresses and hats she had always wanted and make money sewing for other people besides.

It seemed almost too good to be true. But, if true, it would solve our clothes problem. I talked it over with my husband and he agreed with me that it was at least worth finding out about anyway. So I wrote the Institute and was so interested in the information I received that I became a member at once and took up dressmaking.

The lessons were delightfully simple and fascinating and in a little while I was making all my own and the children's clothes at such savings that we could all have more and prettier clothes than we ever had before.

For instance, I made myself a voile dress and all the materials for it cost me just $4.44. This is less than half what it would have cost in a store or made by a dressmaker. I also made a blouse that cost me altogether $2.48. And I have failed to see one as pretty or of as good quality anywhere for less than $6.00. These are just examples of what I am saving all the time on my own clothes.

On things for the children I am saving even a larger proportion of what they would cost ready-made. At any store they wanted $2.25 for an overall suit for my little boy. But I made him one of better materials for 98c. I also made two wash suits for my eight year old son at a total cost of $2.45 and I couldn't buy one for him ready-made for less than $4.00.

I saw a little girl's dress on display marked $3.50. I bought the material and made two just like it at a cost of $3.38.

I had finished only a few lessons when it seemed to me almost everyone I knew wanted me to make clothes for them.

One of the first dresses I made was an orchid shade of lavender organdie for the maid-of-honor at a big wedding. It was beautiful and she was so well pleased she gave me several more orders and sent her friends to me. She said everyone at the wedding spoke about her dress.

I have a number of customers who come to me for all their clothes. One young lady gave me in two weeks time work on which I earned $30.00. Some of my customers have insisted on paying me more than I ask them. One of them said she was willing to pay me any price because the dresses I made for her were always admired.

The best part of it all is that my lessons and my sewing do not interfere with my ordinary work at all. I do all my own work, washing, ironing, baking and cleaning, and I have three small children and an eight room house to care for. My customers tell me they don't see how I can keep my house and family looking so clean and neat and find time to do sewing. I tell them that it is easy enough when you know the right way to sew. The Institute has taught me that, and has been helpful to me in countless other ways. I used to dread trying to make myself even a house dress. It was sure to take me at least a week, and cause me a great deal of worry. Now I can make myself a dress and two or three dresses for other people in a week, besides doing my house work.

It seems funny when I think of it now—how at first I hesitated about taking the Course because I could not see how I was ever going to find the money to pay for it. As it turned out, the Course itself has made it possible for me to earn enough sewing for other people to pay for my lessons, buy the materials for all our clothes, and help out with the household expenses. The family have numerous treats on mother, too.

Everything in the Woman's Institute Course is explained so well, and the teachers take such a personal interest in your work that everything is perfectly easy. It has been the dream of my life to be a first class dressmaker, and now that I can see it coming true I am the happiest woman in the world.

This actual experience of Mrs. Miller, told in her own words, is not unusual. More than 100,000 women and girls in city, town and country have proved that you can easily and quickly learn through the Woman's Institute, in your own home during spare time, to make stylish, becoming clothes and hats for yourself, your family and others, at less than half their usual cost.

It makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail and it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day, or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the Course as you desire and just whenever it is most convenient.

The Institute courses are practical, fascinating and complete. They begin with the very simplest stitches and seams, taking nothing for granted and proceed by logical steps until you can design and completely make even the most elaborate coats and suits.

Every step is explained fully. You learn how to design your own patterns or use tissue-paper patterns, how to cut, fit, and finish garments of all kinds.

You learn the secrets of distinctive dress—what colors and fabrics are most appropriate for different types of women; how to design and create original dresses, how to copy garments you see in shop windows, on the street or in the fashion magazines, or how to adapt and combine features that make clothes distinctively becoming.

The Institute's Courses are so complete that hundreds of students, with absolutely no other preparation, have opened up shops of their own and enjoy large incomes and independence as professional dressmakers or milliners.

It costs you nothing to find out all about the Woman's Institute and what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card, or the convenient coupon below and you will receive without obligation, the full story of this great school that has brought to women and girls all over the world the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

knees, riding on a train for the first time in his life when he came to the school, entered the primary class at eighteen years of age. Now he is an intelligent, highly-paid employee in a large concern.

Entering the primary at twenty-two years of age, a girl was told at the end of the first year that it was no use—she simply could not learn. But she persisted and after a time, as if by miracle, her long-closed mind started to unfold like a flower and she began to pick up everything. It was as if her brain had been asleep. She was graduated with high honors and became a Red Cross nurse. During the War she was placed in a most important position as head of a large hospital.

A GROWN man who said he knew nothing but telegraphy asked if he could work his way through school by telegraphy! The principal did not see how. But presently a student was found who wanted to learn telegraphy, and then another, and another. A class was formed and this man worked his way up through the grades by teaching telegraphy.

Such determination to get an education implies that the education given by the mission schools must be worth while. And it is. Japanese flower arrangement, esthetic dancing and Greek are not taught. Most of the mountaineers are farmers and they are therefore taught how to cultivate and plant, how to judge livestock, how to build a silo, how to prune fruit trees, and how to raise pigs—all this of course in addition to reading, writing, mathematics and ordinary academic courses.
The girls are taught neat carpentering of the simple pieces of furniture needed in the home, gardening, physiology and home nursing, "household and farm arithmetic," domestic science, dressmaking, house furnishing, etc.

All the work at the school is done by the students themselves, no servants being employed. Regularly detailed groups of students care for the buildings, harvest the crops, erect new school buildings or barns when needed, make desks and tables, cook and serve the meals.

For those who wish to study commercial subjects such as bookkeeping, shorthand, typewriting and telegraphy, provision is made. But the main subjects are those most needed in the mountains—farming and homemaking.

One cannot learn farming from books alone. Therefore these schools generally possess a good-sized experiment farm—and the students, after a lesson, have more of the smell of soil and hogs about them than the smell of books.
For the girls, practice cottages are provided where they may actually keep house, planning the meals, living on a budget and performing all the domestic duties of a home.

SOMEONE said to the President of such a school: "I notice a great difference in your students. You must be drawing on a much higher class now than ten years ago."

The answer was that these were the younger brothers and sisters of the ones in the school ten years ago who had gone back and leavened the homes. As a result of this leavening, the present students were truly of a "higher class."

The mountaineer is introduced to the world—with which he has lost acquaintance for two centuries. He no longer regards the people outside the mountains as "furriners," "outlanders" and "quar." He is not terrified by an elevator as was a mountaineer who entered an office building in Asheville and walked up five flights rather than risk the "pesky cage." He does not ask, as did an old man of the mountains: "Do you know Jim Brown? He lives in New York."

I did not know Jim Brown.
"Perhaps if I was to describe him," said the old man, "you mought remember to 've seed him passin' by.
He's a tall, thin man."

So there's an old man of the mountains who will appreciate it if as you walk about the streets of New York you will keep on the lookout for a tall, thin man. That's Jim Brown.

But the schooled mountaineer sees the world in perspective. He knows that, while his own settlement may be large, boasting five families, Chicago and New York are still larger. He knows enough about tilling the soil so that he does not have to resort to moonshining to make a living. And he has had Christian teaching so thoroughly ingrained that he has too much Christian charity and breadth of view to continue old feuds.

HOW strange the cabin home looks sometimes to the returned student.
A girl seventeen years old, who had never been ten miles away from home, got a chance to go to school. Before she went she fixed up the house, for the enjoyment of her parents, in what she considered the height of style. She put up a crude lithograph of Mary of the Bleeding Heart. (The family was Hardshell Baptist). She had no way of knowing that it was a Catholic picture —would not have known what the word "Catholic" itself meant. Appended to this, she hung another picture of some dead birds and rabbits.
Then she papered every remaining inch of space on the walls and ceiling with pages from a Chicago mail order catalog so that the room was a veritable art gallery of watches, engagement rings, wedding rings, phonographs, shoes, hats, dishes, cameras and banjos.

When she came back, how odd the place looked! Down came the Chicago art gallery and the Catholic symbol, up went a beautiful rotogravure of Jesus and the little children which she had received at the Christian school and in went a glass window to admit the light of outdoors. She made neat, mission-style chairs and a table to replace the gnarled makeshifts formerly used. At the edge of the clearing she built with her own hands a chicken house and a model pig pen like the one at the school, and made a garden. She quickly mended the ailing health of two small brothers by applying her knowledge of dietetics to the cooking of proper food. And each Sunday, since there was no church within a day's journey, she brought out the beautiful Bible which had been awarded to her as a prize by the school and conducted a little family service.

Schools which accomplish such results are worth while. "Don't go West to find a new plantation," say the schools. "Plow deeper and you will find a new one just below the old one you've been scratching on." In the same way it may be said that the denominations have found a fertile field in the mountain work. But they are only scratching it. They need to plow deeper. Where there are a few dozen schools there should be hundreds.
In the high nooks and crannies of the Appalachian mountains there are still more than two million people of old American stock locked away from opportunity.

uncertainty, but it was known that Kronstadt and several fortresses on the south shore of the Gulf of Finland, with garrisons numbering tens of thousands, were holding out against the Bolsheviks and even threatening the capture of the city. War Minister Trotsky ordered large forces sent to Petrograd from other districts, but the joining of battle on an extensive scale was delayed because of doubts as to the loyalty of the reinforcements.

The Petrograd uprising was regarded as constituting less of a menace to the Soviet regime than the widespread and sporadic peasant uprisings. Unless the Kronstadt movement succeeds quickly the Bolshevik rulers will be able to starve the garrisons into submission, but in a struggle against the rural population it would be the Bolsheviks in the cities who would starve.

Spanish Premier Assassinated

PREMIER EDUARDO DATO, for many years one of the most powerful Spanish politicians, was assassinated in Madrid while returning to his home after a night session of the Spanish Senate. As the Premier's automobile sped along a dark street, a motorcycle with a side car drew alongside and the two men in it opened fire with pistols, twenty-one shots being discharged. The Premier was wounded so seriously that he died within a few minutes, while the assassins dashed down a side street and escaped. An official report said the murderers were believed to have been Syndicalists.

There has been widespread industrial unrest in Spain for many months, and at times the disorders have attained almost the proportions of a revolution. Señor Dato, the head of the Liberal-Conservative party, the strongest group in the Cortes, was regarded by the working classes as their enemy and as opposed to all reforms, a reputation due in part to the sternness with which he suppressed the workers' movement in August, 1917, when he was serving as Premier for the second time. One of Spain's frequent political crises a little later caused the fall of his ministry, his sympathy for the Allied cause in the war contributing to that end, but he remained a strong factor in the government and again assumed the Premiership last September.

After many consultations among the conservative groups, Manuel Allende Salazar accepted the premiership and formed a new cabinet. Syndicalist agitation in Spain has been less violent recently, due to a more moderate tendency of public opinion, and it was hoped a conciliatory attitude by the new cabinet would hasten the solution of Spain's financial and industrial problems.

DOMESTIC

WAGE-CUTTING MOVEMENT SPREADS. With railroads all over the country taking steps toward reductions of wages and the meat packers announcing decreases of 12½ to 15 per cent. in the pay of their 100,000 workers, the industrial situation was becoming more threatening. The packing unions ordered a strike vote and railroad unions also were considering means of resisting the wage cuts.

GENERAL WOOD SENT TO PHILIPPINES. Major General Leonard Wood has been commissioned by President Harding to investigate conditions in the Philippines, a conference having resulted in the withdrawal of the invitation for him to become governor-general of the islands. Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania were planning to elect General Wood to be provost of that institution at a salary said to be $25,000.

NEW YORK RENT LAWS UPHELD. The constitutionality of emergency rent legislation designed to protect New York tenants from exorbitant rents was upheld fully by the state Courts of Appeals on the ground that contract rights must yield when in conflict with public welfare. The landlords have carried the fight to the United States Supreme Court.

FOREIGN

PANAMA FIGHTING STOPPED. The despatch by Secretary Hughes of identical notes demanding that Panama and Costa Rica cease hostilities immediately has resulted in the restoration of peace between the two republics, and their boundary dispute is to be mediated.

FORMER W. C. T. U. HEAD DIES. Lady Henry Somerset, formerly President of the World's W. C. T. U. and President of the National British Women's Temperance Association, died at her home in London.

AMERICAN BECOMES A CARDINAL. Archbishop Dougherty of Philadelphia has received from Pope Benedict the red hat, symbolic of his elevation to the rank of cardinal. Two German prelates were made cardinals at the same time, and three Spanish prelates will receive their red hats from King Alfonso.

TURKISH TREATY MODIFIED. The Allied Supreme Council in London has agreed on its proposals for the modification of the peace treaty with Turkey, but details of the changes were withheld. Time was to be allowed for the Turkish and Greek delegations to go home to consult their governments regarding its acceptance.

The Bloom of Youth

Comes Mainly From Eating the Right Foods

Note Why Raisins Are Important

RAISINS are delicious, but don't eat them for their lusciousness alone. Use them for their natural iron content also. Your daily food should furnish iron. A small supply is needed daily to keep the blood in good condition.

Iron brings the bloom of youth to women's and children's cheeks, and is vital to true vigor in all men.

Raisins make scores of plain foods taste luxurious while adding but a mite to cost. Try them in your boiled rice, oatmeal, cornbread, cakes and cookies.

Always use them in bread pudding, and in other simple puddings and desserts. See how much better the whole family likes these foods with raisins.

Raisins increase nutrition also. They furnish 1560 calories of energizing nutriment per pound.

| 1 cup sugar | 1/2 cup SUN-MAID Seedless Raisins |
| 2 cups milk | 1 tablespoon cornstarch (flour may be substituted) |
| 1/4 teaspoon salt | 1 teaspoon vanilla or lemon extract (flavor to taste) |
| 3 eggs | |

Put milk in top of double boiler; mix cornstarch with a little cold milk; add salt and cook thoroughly and until mixture thickens sufficiently to hold raisins, then stir in the well beaten eggs and add raisins, flavoring and sugar, turn into buttered pudding dish and bake in moderate oven fifteen or twenty minutes. Delicious served with flavored whipped cream or lemon pudding sauce.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

Ask for Sun-Maid Raisins when you order. They are made in California from the finest table grapes, kinds too delicate, thin-skinned and juicy to ship long distances as fresh grapes. You may never have these fresh grapes, but you can buy them anywhere as raisins. Try them. See how good they are. THREE VARIETIES: Sun-Maid Seeded (seeds removed), Sun-Maid Seedless (grown without seeds), Sun-Maid Clusters (on the stem).

Questions and Answers

MRS. C. J. B., The 13th Chapter of 1 Corinthians has been called "The New Testament Psalm of Christian Love," for here Paul gives the widest and fullest interpretation to the greatest of the Christian graces. Charity is not charity unless it is inspired by love—that love, not only of our neighbor, but of all mankind, which has its highest illustration in "for God so loved the world." With this love in our hearts, our sympathies expand to all whom we can help; we are moved by the spirit of kindness and compassion which Jesus showed in His earthly ministry. Envy, hate, selfishness, greed, vanity cannot exist in a heart that is filled with love for all humanity, and which constantly seeks to find expression in kindly words and deeds, in self-denial, in sacrifices for others and in refraining from harsh judgments of anyone who may have slipped or fallen. We read in the same chapter where Paul explains that merely giving of our substance, without giving love with the gift, counts for little or nothing. Some do this for vain-glory and to gain reputation; but He who searches the heart knows their object and judges them accordingly. We must give ourselves with what we give to others, or the gift will be in vain. We must make allowances for others, and put on their acts, as far as facts will permit, only the kindest construction. We must return good for evil, be ready to gladly bear all trials and submit to sacrifices for the sake of others. The love that is ready for such tests as these is the love which, under the name of charity, the apostle proclaims as the highest of the graces of Christian life and character.

J. M., Worcester, Mass., writes: "There are many calls to the Church today, urging increased zeal and energy in the proclamation of the Gospel. Has any similar situation appeared in the early days of the Church, and if so, what was the remedy applied?"

From age to age, the spirituality of the Church has needed to be revived. We see evidences of this even in the times of St. John the Apostle, who expresses the need in his messages to the churches in Asia. It has often been remarked that some of the sermons preached in the third and fourth centuries would not be inapplicable to present-day conditions, if preached in our American churches. All through the Church's history, the message needed for the time never lacked for a strong leader to deliver it.

E. E. D., Missouri. 1. We should be careful how we judge others. There are some persons to whom we do not instinctively become attracted, and yet who, on closer acquaintance, may prove to be admirable in character. To draw the line on first impressions is always unwise and often proves unjust. If on closer acquaintance you are convinced that a person is unworthy of intimate relationship, you are justified in drawing the line, but not otherwise. 2. See Deut. 5:9 which may cover what you mean. 3. Before God, all are equal. He is no respecter of persons. Even though we progress in the divine life and become capable of doing good service for the advancement of the Kingdom, we should cultivate humility, not esteeming ourselves too highly but ever striving to reach a goal of greater usefulness. The last part of your letter has been sent to the Prayer League.

J. P. Williams, Brady, Tex., will be very grateful to any reader who sends to him a copy of the old hymn: "Oh, Sing to Me of Heaven."

C. D. P., Delaware, O. The immigrant who comes to our shores "unclean, unhealthy, indisposed to industry, etc.," would probably be classed as undesirable and rejected.

Mrs. R. M. H., Idabel, Okla., writes: "I can't see why any Christian hates to give up dancing, cards, and all such things. If truly converted, they won't want to go to such amusements. I never see an entrance to a picture show where there are all kinds on the screen, but this Scripture comes to mind: 'Wide is the gate that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat.' If Christians are found in worldly crowds when Jesus comes, how can He tell the difference? We could hardly do without the Christian Herald; especially do we enjoy the spiritual pieces and find them very helpful."

Subscriber, Haverhill, Mass.: The statement, which you say has been made by a clergyman, that there are in the world today forty persons, each claiming to be Christ, has not come to our notice. We assume it is a case in which the minister in question has got an impression and stated it as a fact. There are no doubt a few fanatics, impostors and false leaders of the class against whom Jesus warned his followers. Why not write to the clergyman asking for the authority for his statement?

OH, MONEY! MONEY!

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

"If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the key-note of Mrs. Porter's story. Stanley Fulton, a bachelor with only dollars for companionship, begins to wonder what will become of his twenty millions when he dies. In order to test in advance his only relatives—three distant cousins whom he has never seen—he decides to give them each one hundred thousand dollars and then appear among them as plain John Smith and watch the result of his experiment. How the money was spent by the different families, bringing joy and a wholesome life to some, and only sorrow to others, and how "John Smith" himself learns a needed lesson and finds a wife, is told in this book.

Into countless thousands of homes, the novels of Eleanor H. Porter have come as harbingers of sunshine and gladness: Wherever the English language is spoken, men and women have grown to recognize her supreme gift as an interpreter of the happy heart of childhood. As one woman wrote from a little mountain village in Kentucky, "More than any one else, Mrs. Porter gives back to us the joy of knowing that this is a beautiful world."

Four Fine Cloth-Bound Books, 5x7 1/2 inches, Good Paper and Clear Print, 1310 Pages

Do you dare make pie for company?

You should know that good pie crust, every time, is not a matter of "luck". It comes from knowing the right kinds and proportions of shortening and flour, the amount of water to use, and the proper method of baking. Poor shortening, too little shortening, too much water, or too much handling makes pie crust tough; bread flour absorbs too much water; too cool an oven permits the filling to soak into the crust.

Good cooks prefer Crisco for pastry because it is the richest shortening that can be made; because it is a pure, wholesome, vegetable product; and because it is tasteless, thereby permitting the full, natural flavors of the pie filling to prevail, unspoiled by any greasy taste in the crust.

Relief for the Farmers

What the Government Can Do to Improve Conditions

By ARTHUR CAPPER

(United States Senator from Kansas)

CLEARLY the farming business cannot exist unless credit conditions and market conditions are remedied soon. We must put farming on a fully modern business basis. There is not a living market for farm products in the United States today. Where there is no living market no industry can exist, not even the unappreciated and overburdened industry of agriculture.

The farmer has been made the goat so often that it was thought he could be made the goat again in this big task of deflation. The fall in prices of farm products the past year means a loss to the farmers of more than six billion dollars.

The necessity of practical co-operation between the government and the farmer and the protection of the nation's food resources was never so acute as now. Credit is an absolute necessity to the life of agriculture today and to the food supply of our cities in the future.

Lack of credit is sending breeding animals to market in trainloads. There has been no wool market for months, and recently a Wyoming sheepman paid $2.10 a sheep for freight and received $1.75 a head for them. A few months ago thirty bushels of corn would buy a good suit of clothes, and now it requires 100 bushels of corn to buy the same suit. A bushel of wheat would buy ten gallons of gasoline, but it will buy a little more than half that quantity now; and so it goes with everything the farmer buys, and worse than that, with the money he borrows, for he often pays from ten to twenty per cent. interest and signs as security a property statement on everything he owns. We grudgingly give to our farmers credit at ruinous rates, but our Wall Street bankers never hesitated when the Cuban sugar planters needed financing. We can supply Wall Street with billions for gambling, we can advance the railroads more than a billion on a broken-down transportation system and aid the profiteering planters of Cuba, but have not shown decent business justice to our farmers.

America protects manufacturing industries from the cheap labor and lower living standards of Europe but does not protect the greatest of all our industries—agriculture—from the same foreign competition. Everything the American farmer sells is sold with world competition, and everything he buys he must purchase in a protected market. He competes with South America and Australasia when he sells wool or mutton, and he must buy his clothing with a thirty per cent. tariff tax added; for his government protects the manufacturer of woollens, but does not protect the producer of wool. The interests of the American farmer are so intricately mixed with the interests of all America that a just protection is a necessity for the whole country.

SENATOR Capper, as the representative of a great agricultural state, and as the publisher of several farm publications, has obtained a thorough grasp of the serious problems confronting the American farmers; and his high standing in the Senate will make him an important factor in the solution of those problems. His proposals deserve careful consideration.

INASMUCH as the present situation has been largely brought about by necessary governmental interference with what would otherwise be the restraining effect of the law of supply and demand, it is quite reasonable to appeal to the government which was compelled to create this condition, to relieve it, so far as it may do so, without violation of economic principles.

If a government can finance a war emergency, why can't it do something to finance a peace emergency? Didn't our government do that last year when it let the railroads have $600,000,000?

Agricultural interests could point to this precedent in the action of the government in relieving the railroads of too sudden readjustment on their return to private ownership. The farming industry is just as important as the transportation problem.

As for a permanent remedy for the ills of agriculture, farming should be put first in our national policy. We should give the farming business its full economic rights. We should map out a great constructive policy for agriculture and put it through, give free rein to every legitimate scheme of co-operation among farmers and tax the land-hog speculator out of existence. We want to remove this absentee landlord-leech—and put the landowning, permanent, contented American back on the land.

There should be fair and open markets for all farm products free from manipulation and hold-ups by speculators and middlemen. There should be full and complete facilities for nation-wide co-operative marketing by farmers, and there should be a better marketing system so that all impediments to the free flow of the law of supply and demand may be removed by constructive control of the great agencies of distribution, and a wise regulation of freight rates on farm products.

At the present time the charges on a car of grain or hay from farm to market consume one-half the amount that the man who grew the stuff gets for his year's work, his outlay and his investment in producing it.

When, as is now the case, the railroads are permitted to charge such rates that the farmer cannot "break even" on the cost of production and is actually out of pocket for everything he sells, it is high time to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. A car of grain shipped recently from Oklahoma to Chicago cost the grower $550 in freight charges and brought him a return of $592. Another car shipped to market at an expense of $525 brought the producer $475, and he had to pay twenty cents a hundred pounds for threshing in addition to the fifty-one cents a hundred paid to the railroad company in freight charges.

During this period of market collapse, I believe the Interstate Commerce Commission has a chance to set business going by granting immediately an emergency rate on farm products of at least one-third under the existing tariff, this rate to remain in effect for no less than six months from the date it is promulgated.

THE business world must give the farmer a chance to market his products if it wants him to pay his debts. This six months' emergency rate would give him that chance. All railroad presidents should urge this remedy on the score that the temporary loss in rates would be more than offset by a general revival of trade and a nation-wide business and employment.

The Interstate Commerce Commission demonstrated its wisdom last year when it helped the railroads in their straits by promptly making available a large part of the six hundred million dollars advanced to them by Congress. The farming industry is even more vital than the transportation question and the Commission would bring credit to its organization if it will aid in getting farm products to market at this period when the national welfare is at stake.

We should also abolish gambling in wheat, corn and all farm products. The Federal Reserve act should be amended so as to provide preferential rates for loans for productive purposes over loans for speculative purposes. When the Federal Reserve Board and the market gamblers "deflated" farm products to the extent of from six to eight billions in less than six months, they took more away from the country's wealth producers than there is in circulation in all the forty-eight States and bound them hand and foot so far as credit is concerned.

Big wheat pit operators or Wall street speculators can get thousands or millions at any time to carry stocks over price, but it is not called legitimate. To try to hold any of his products at a low price. Only one dollar in every three dollars of the re-discounts of the Federal Reserve Bank is farmer's paper. Yet large sales of foreign bonds listed daily show that American money is buying these securities to aid foreign agriculture and industries.

Give our farmers a chance to do business on equal terms with the rest of the United States. The Federal Reserve system, if it gives any aid at all to the farmers, renders a totally inadequate credit service. Its paper shows that it is providing one dollar of credit for this country's eighty billion dollar farm industry to one thousand dollars of credit extended elsewhere. This Federal Reserve Act should be so amended that farmers will have an equal benefit with other business men from this system. It should furnish preferential rates for loans for production purposes. It should provide for loans on warehouse receipts that farmers may market their produce in an orderly way.

THE Warehouse Act should be extended so as to serve the needs of both individuals and co-operative associations and there should be based upon it a rural credit plan which will enable the farmer individually and collectively to obtain implements, machinery, improved live-stock and seed, etc., after the fashion that real estate loans are now provided.

The erection of international credit machinery by which we can enable Europe to buy our surplus, pending this recuperation season, will stimulate agricultural industry here by providing a foreign market.

We should remove obstacles from proper co-operative action and proper collective bargaining on the part of the producers of farm products and on the consumers of farm products.

There should be State and National supervision of middlemen handling food, especially when such middlemen are able to control distribution and consequently can control or influence the price charged to the consumer.

We can aid agricultural industries if we can secure improved distribution, encourage additional facilities on existing rail lines, initiate new water and motor transportation, secure good roads and seek equalization of freight rates on farm products.

We should also provide government supervision of the operation of refrigerating elevator and storage companies when these companies operate as public utilities.

We should not fail to eliminate by all possible federal action and also by action within the states all waste and parasitic profits which are to be found between the farmers and the consumers of the United States.

There should be encouragement rather than adverse legislation for co-operative buying by consumers.

We should give all possible encouragement to the young men who want to buy farms and live on the land, by extending the use of capital by federal and state action, as in the present federal plan to the farmer who already owns a farm.

We should adjust taxes so that the burden falls on the land-hog and his land rather than upon the buildings or improvements or the products of farm labor.

We should enact a tariff law at once which will give the American farmers that measure of protection which may be necessary to equalize the difference between the costs of production in this country and the cost in competing nations, where land is cheap and living conditions lower than the standards which prevail here.

We should place an immediate embargo on the importation of Canadian wheat into this country where it is not needed.

THE warehouse receipt plan when put into effect will greatly aid:

1st—Collecting grain in licensed state or federal warehouses with official grading inspection and regulation.

2nd—Issuing uniform warehouse receipts against this stored grain.

3rd—Pooling these warehouse receipts in the hands of a government appointee. Issuing certificates of indebtedness against these receipts, such certificates to run for periods from three to fifteen months. Such certificates will sell readily to the investing public and will provide ample capital for financing the grain until it can be sold to the consumer.

Congress must solve this problem and as one remedial measure it must re-establish foreign trade relations, that our surplus stock, crops, live-stock and cotton may find a market.

The War Finance Corporation ought to operate at once. There is no other way to market the 12,000,000 bales of cotton of the last crop and our other great surpluses. Congress should see to it that agriculture is afforded equitable credit accommodations; and there is no reason why a solvent farmer should not have credits as cheaply as any other business man. With honest markets, with agriculture put on an organized business basis, with the hazardous industry free from the economic crimes now committed against it; with the knowledge that his crop will pay him for the cost of production with a fair profit, the American farmer will go ahead and help to make America the best fed and the most prosperous nation in the world.

The time has come when agriculture must be recognized as the first industry of the country and must be supported as such by the public if the industries and commerce of the consumers are to continue to thrive.

“Barbarians” in the Church Choir

A LADY living in Cleveland, Ohio, still so vigorous in mind and body that she regularly takes an active part in missionary meetings and attends church services, vouches for the following incident about Rev. Charles G. Finney when he was pastor of the Congregationalist church at Oberlin, Ohio. The choir of which this lady was a member had sung an anthem which was followed by the “long prayer.” While praying Dr. Finney expressed his views to the Lord about the singing in the following fashion: “Oh, Lord, we have sung to thy praise. We hope it has benefited the choir. If it has not benefited them we do not know whom it has benefited, as we were utterly unable to understand the words.” “At the close of the service,” this lady added, “Dr. Finney requested the singers to remain, and came up into the choir loft and talked very pleasantly to us about enunciating the words plainly when we sang.”

Doubtless many another pastor has put up, though inaudibly, the same disconsolate cry, and doubtless he has longed to have a straightforward kindly talk with his choir as Dr. Finney did; but, for fear of their saying the “barbarian” was in the pulpit rather than in the choir, has kept silent. But Dr. Finney's idea of the right way of devotional singing we find existed away back in the fourth century. St. Augustine in writing to Ambrose after hearing the great chorus choirs Ambrose had organized told of his tears shed in the psalmody of the church, and then adds naively: “I am moved not with the singing but with the things sung when sung with a clear voice and modulation most suitable.”

John McCormack, one of America's most popular singers of heart-melodies, holds the same view and in a recent article in the American Magazine, he said: “The appeal of a heart song is a double one, musical and human, and the way to divide it, I think, is five per cent. musical and ninety-five per cent. human.” If all singers in our church choirs could by some grace be possessed of that idea we would have no more “barbarians” to interrupt divine worship. Mr. McCormack reveals his plain common sense: “When singing in English to English speaking audiences I always sing with as perfect enunciation as I am capable of.”

If Mr. McCormack's opinion of the larger value of the human appeal in singing a heart-song be correct, then surely the human appeal should hold as large a place in the singing of sacred songs. Yet frequently the experience of church-goers is that church choirs blur if they do not entirely obliterate the ninety-five per cent value in studied efforts to express the five per cent value. Mr. McCormack is evidently one of the common sufferers from this kind of singing, for he says, “It is a curious thing that most singers will study and practice indefatigably to achieve perfect diction in French and Italian, but will sing English with a careless, slipshod enunciation which makes it perfectly unintelligible.”

How was it with the unfamiliar solo or anthem which you heard last Sunday? Could you understand five consecutive words of it? Congregations are so accustomed to meaningless vocalizations they succumb to this outrage in divine worship in silent helplessness.

A Plea for Distinct Enunciation in Devotional Singing

By JAS. TOOKEN FORD

MUSIC, is but the plumage and the soul embodied in the words is the living thing. When the thought is killed by meaningless sounds, be those sounds even divinely musical, then the singer becomes a musical taxidermist presenting plumage alone. The plumage may be as gorgeous as that of a Bird of Paradise, but the bird is dead. The heart longs for the entrancing carol of a living robin as he pours forth his grateful heart in thanksgiving from a tree-top at dawn, or the notes of a living brown thrush, or the sweet rhapsody of the happy little wren.

An opera house may be the place to display mere musical vocalization, as a museum is the place to display dead plumage, but the House of God is a living grove where David, Fanny Crosby, Watts, Newton, Heber and others, a great flock, pour forth their praises through the ages, made to live again by the power of gifted human voices. And a gifted voice can perform this miracle only through the distinct enunciation of a David's or a Heber's living words.

But one may say, “My soul goes out in worship on the sweet strains of vocal music regardless of the words.” Undoubtedly rapturous music is exalting, as also were the rhapsodies of “tongues” in the early church, but of these unintelligible “tongues” Paul says: “If I know not the meaning of the voice I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me.” Equally so if I know not the meaning of a singer's voice I shall be to him a “barbarian” and most surely he is a “barbarian” unto me; and the song which should carry the soul up to the presence of God carries it merely to the feet of the singer.

Granting that musical vocalization alone without any distinguishable words can cast a spell over the audience and loose the wings of imagination to bear this one to some scene of happy bygone days, and that one to the zero hour when he was ready to go over the top, another to the awesome stillness of a great forest—yet the emotions inspired by the music alone are necessarily as varied as the number of auditors.

BUT when the words of a sacred song are enunciated so distinctly as to be heard in the farthest corner, and heard without effort, then the whole audience is borne up by the spell of one great definite experience which the sweet passion of the singer has realized and glorified. Each great song of the church, whether by David, Watts, or Wesley, is either a vision from a mount of inspiration flashed on the soul with lightning-like suddenness or perhaps a slow crystallization of the heart-experiences of a lifetime; but each sacred song preserved by the church represents some definite great thought which the singer makes to live again only by very distinct enunciation.

The writer recently heard a singer of national repute sing an original song written for an occasion at which thousands were present. The writer sat with three friends in easy ear-shot, all in perfect sympathy with the singer; but of his four or five stanzas none of us, even with the closest attention, could make out a word, and not more than a line or two of the chorus. The pains, time, and probably prayer spent on putting the thought into form was absolutely lost on us at least, because none of us knew what the singer was singing about. He might just as well have used Choctaw and set it to music and poured out his soul's enthusiasm. As far as the song was concerned he was a “barbarian” unto us.

The very opposite of this unintelligible style is that of Mr. Homer Rodeheaver, who is well known through his leadership of great choruses in the Sunday campaigns. When Mr. Rodeheaver sings “Brighten the Corner Where You Are,” or any gospel song, his audiences even of fifteen thousand or more, are held attentive by the clear words of a definite message. Also when directing conferences for song directors, he says: “I especially emphasize distinct enunciation as one of the most important points, especially in singing the Gospel message.” The occupant of the pew cannot understand the viewpoint of a singer who sings English to an English-speaking audience in such a way as to make it “perfectly unintelligible.”

My Tenants

By HARRIET WHITNEY SYMONDS

EACH season, at the busy, growing time,
Come applicants for lodgings by the score—
Sweet Honeysuckle, asking leave to climb
The lattice-work outside my cottage door,

And gentle Clematis, who craves a place
About my study's sunny window ledge,
And Yellow-Rose, who would secure the space
That lies along my porch's outer edge.

So many come I cannot name them all,
But none are turned away while I can find
A vacant niche or nook, however small,
Where some wee spray may cling or trail or wind.

And careful to exact my due,
You ask: Are rental charges promptly met?
Indeed, I give my sacred word to you,
My tenants keep me ever in their debt.

Fair terms and moderate I like to make—
A waft of sweetness when the night seems slow
To pass, a breath of honey when I wake,
A glimpse of cheery warmth and sunny glow.

This payment only would I ask, but they,
For bits of lodging and growing room,
By far exceeds the measure every day
With lavish waste of fragrance and of bloom.

Christianity and Education

Determining the Relationship of Church and School

By

REV. E. A. McALPIN, Jr., D.D.

AMERICA is proud to be called the land of free schools. All children are given the opportunity of an education from kindergarten through high school, and the day is fast approaching when they will also receive free university training.

To safeguard young people from the proselyting spirit, all teaching of Christianity has been crowded out of the educational system. The consequences of this action are now apparent. We have been developing an irreligious people.

The lack of religious training during the plastic age of youth has taught them to think lightly of religion and they grow up without the self-control that Christianity develops. Judge Crain of New York recently said that the "neglect of religious training among the young is responsible for the great prevalence of crime." This is evidence that cannot be denied.

The first step towards solving this problem is the clear understanding of what relations should exist between Christianity and Education.

There are four possible relationships between education and Christianity.

The first is to subordinate education to Christianity. This was tried in the past and given up as hopeless. No one could teach or believe anything that was antagonistic to Christianity. This theory made the Church oppose Galileo and force him to deny the truth. This spirit bitterly opposed Darwin and his theory of evolution. It led to the hampering of all investigators and meant the binding of all educational processes in the swaddling clothes of mediaeval theology. No one could think freely or delve into the mysteries of nature with a free mind. No one wants to go back to any such theory of education. It is too childish for thoughtful men to consider seriously. It has been thrown into the rubbish heap of civilization as hopelessly impotent.

THE second theory is that Christianity should be subordinated to education. This theory was a natural reaction from the evils that existed when the Church dominated education. Scholars knew that freedom of thought and investigation must be guaranteed if advancement was to be made. Men of deep Christian convictions felt that the science and philosophy in which their religion was clothed were not its essential elements. Science and philosophy might change through a clearer understanding of the principles of life but the fundamentals of the Christian faith would still exist, as they are the answer to universal human needs that cannot be changed by scientific facts or philosophical systems.

As a theory this presents few weaknesses. It was only after the theory had been put into practise that these weaknesses developed. It meant the elimination from education of everything that was of a distinct and compelling Christian character. Schools and colleges that had been founded by Christian people with the primary object of training ministers boasted of their freedom from any religious bias. Formal chapel services and sparsely attended Y. M. C. A. meetings composed their only definitely Christian features. Brilliant men who openly scoffed at Christianity or showed by their lives an utter disregard for its commandments were professors. A mental attitude openly hostile or callously indifferent to Christianity pervaded the classrooms. While this antagonistic spirit was developing in colleges and technical schools the public school system forbade the teaching of anything distinctly Christian. The most that was permitted was a perfunctory reading of the Scriptures.

Young people from kindergarten to university were educated in an atmosphere that was, at best, silent on religious subjects or, at worst, openly hostile to the teachings of Christ. Is it any wonder that we have an irreligious race of young people in our land today? They are the fruit of our educational system. The Church has tried to meet this problem by developing Sunday schools and there teaching the children of the Church the principles of Christianity.

Three things have made this noble effort a sad failure. The amount of time given to instruction is totally inadequate, as usually only twenty-six hours a year is spent in Bible study, and this is too short a time to give any real knowledge of this subject. The difficulty of getting teachers has made the standard of teaching very low, and few of them are capable of imparting any real training in the limited time at their disposal. The inability to require attendance has allowed the vast majority of children to come irregularly, and so most of them fail to gain the training that might come from this limited time and inadequate teaching if it were properly used.

THE practical working out of this theory that Christianity should be subordinated to education has led in its application to the third possible theory—that Christianity and education ought to be divorced from one another.

This is the most fallacious of all theories. Any education worthy of being called an education deals not only with training the mind and hand, but also with the creation of character. The educated man is a man with a complete training. Mere culture apart from character is a hollow, despicable thing. The refined roué is more despicable than the crude illiterate who indulges his baser passions like an animal. The roué knows what he should do, but for his personal pleasure refuses to do it. The ignorant man knows nothing better than animal gratification and therefore is less blameworthy.

Is education merely the mastering of foreign languages and acquiring some knowledge of mathematics and a grasp of philosophy, or is it a training for life?

If it is the mere acquiring of facts and the ability to think clearly it might be possible to divorce all religion from the educational system. If education is a training for life then there must be added to the intellectual discipline the moral control that comes from a virile religious faith. We have tried to divorce education from all religious training and we have suffered a real loss of moral character.

There remains another theory that suggests a solution for this problem. This is that Christianity and education must be co-ordinated in order to maintain and perpetuate a Christian nation. This is the theory underlying some successful preparatory schools and so-called Church colleges. In these institutions no effort is made to teach theology or control the spirit of research and investigation. Men and women with the best intellectual training possible and of a virile piety are engaged as professors.

The idea underlying this theory is that Christianity is a life. It is not imparted by rule of thumb or the learning of creeds. It is caught by moral and spiritual contagion. The atmosphere, charged with the dynamics of a spiritual idealism, reacts on the student's spiritual life. It is not perpetuated by any special geological, biological or astronomical theory. The teachers and students are free to follow Darwin, Newton, Einstein or any other authority in their own field of research who wins their allegiance by convincing their intellect. The laboratories are open for research and investigation.

But the atmosphere sought by the institution is not only scholarly, it is also positively Christian. The teachers are men and women who accept the teachings and person of Christ as showing men the way to live. They believe in the importance of keeping a man's spiritual life in touch with God. From these institutions come students whose training has made them respect the place of Christianity in their personal lives. Their characters have been trained as well as their brains.

VARIOUS efforts are being made to bring this religious atmosphere into public schools. We have only space here to consider two of these efforts. These are presented, as a combination of them could be developed into a complete system of religious instruction for the public school.

The first is the Gary Plan. This in brief is the setting apart of a school period each week for religious instruction. The children of those parents who request it are dismissed from school for this period and required to attend the class held by their parents' Church. The school has no jurisdiction over this period and merely requires the child's attendance. This is best adapted for Grammar School Grades.

The other is known as the North Dakota Plan. In this effort, no period is given for instruction, but the Sunday School Association has prepared a syllabus on the Bible which deals with the history, times and lives of Biblical characters. This syllabus is very comprehensive and accurate. The State School Board has accepted the syllabus and gives examinations on it. The child may study the Bible under any system of theology his parents desire. That is outside of the School Board's province. For passing an examination on the syllabus credit is given for outside work. This method is best adapted for High School students.

A combination of the ideas underlying the Gary Plan for Grammar Schools and the North Dakota Plan for High Schools would give a complete system of religious training for all children and also give the moral support that comes from the school's interest in having every student given definite religious training.

SOME plan must be worked out for the whole country. Children ought to know that the State expects every citizen to serve the Church of his choice conscientiously and intelligently. We must keep the state and Church separate to protect them from interfering with each other's functions. But no strong Christian nation can exist that does not have its citizens intelligent and loyal to the Church of their choice. The Y. M. C. A. is doing a good work in its High School Bible Classes, but all such independent effort, of necessity, must fail to create the unconscious appreciation of the importance of Christianity that its recognition by the school system is bound to give.

Let these voluntary efforts continue and be improved upon and multiplied as much as possible. They are of supreme importance in keeping alive the spontaneity of all true Christian faith, but let us also have as a background the state's recognition of the importance of Christianity as a foundation of character.

America should create a system of education that will develop an intelligent and industrious people controlled by personal piety, as this is a step toward solving all social and economic problems. These problems have their roots in human selfishness and in a disregard for the well-being of others. Christianity points out the sinfulness of the selfish life and the enormity of disregarding the well-being of others.

Here is a problem demanding immediate action on the part of the Church. The Church cannot do this work alone. By all means encourage her to perfect the Sunday school and young people's work, as they are of priceless value. But let the Church also bring pressure to bear on the state until we have established from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from our island possessions to the frozen north of Alaska, an educational system that brings the sanctions and appeal of Christianity to every boy and girl, young man and young woman during their educational life. Then and only then will America have the kind of citizens that she needs to meet the problems of the future.

Dr. Sheldon Discusses

The Creed of Jesus

1. He believed in God so naturally that He never tried to prove His existence but took it for granted like the air He breathed or the food He ate.
2. He believed in His own mission, which was to give men life abundantly.
3. He believed in the fact of sin and man's redemption from it by repentance and faith.
4. He believed in heaven and hell and taught that men make their choice of either right or wrong.
5. He believed in the possibility of a Human Brotherhood based on the oneness of human need and dependence.
6. He believed in the capacity of mankind to learn and accept the greatness of the abundant life.
7. He believed in the fact of immortality and took it for granted, as He did the existence of God, never arguing about it.
8. He believed in the seriousness of life without being gloomy or ascetic. And He taught that life should be measured, not by pleasure, but by its joy in service.
9. He believed that prayer is a necessity for a full grown life and taught the need of it without arguing about its meaning.
10. He believed in His own teaching so much that He commanded it to be taught to every nation and laid it upon the Church as a last and binding commission.

What do you think of the Creed of Jesus? Can you find a better one for yourself?

The Weary Willies of Borneo

The Eighth Article in a Series on "New Worlds"

By WILLARD PRICE

THE American hobo has his counterpart in Borneo! In the United States, hoboism numbers nearly half a million members. It has its own technical terms, its own signs and symbols, professional ethics and standards of efficiency. The American tramp may be pardoned for imagining that his national branch excels all other divisions of the Grand International Order of Hoboes.

But a committee of American vagrants should be delegated to visit Borneo! They would come back with some new ideas! They would perhaps be more moderate in their personal self-satisfaction. For the excellencies of method current among the hoboes of Borneo are such as to make the brothers in America turn green with envy.

For example, in spite of our much vaunted national inventiveness, it has never occurred to the gentleman of the road in America to attach a cushion to his coat tail! Although he sits down fifty times a day, on wayside rocks, iron trestles, scraggly stumps and lumpy ground, this simple and comfortable expedient has never entered his mind.

Contrast this stupidity with the cleverness of the wandering dyak. He hooks a thick mat to the rear of his "chawat" or loin-cloth. It swings gracefully behind him as he strides down the jungle trails from one back door to another. The customary method of expelling unwelcome guests need never dismay the dyak, for he has his armor where it is most needed. And whenever he grows weary, all he has to do is to sway his body forward a trifle to bring the mat well under him, and then sit down quickly. He does not need to search about for a soft resting-place. He has it always with him, following close behind.

And the dyak tramp sits down frequently! Laziness is easy in a country where the weather is "nine months hot and three months hotter."

TWO missionaries had an amusing experience with a company of wandering dyaks. The missionaries are Mr. and Mrs. James Hoover, and they live in an American-built house on the shore of the Rejang River, Borneo.

One evening Mrs. Hoover was called to the door to find sixty weary, travel-stained wanderers—for the tramps of Malaysia, again showing their superiority over their American brethren, travel in groups for mutual protection.

"Have you any tobacco?" asked their spokesman.

"No."

"Have you any sweet potatoes?"

These were forthcoming, and the Weary Willies prepared their evening meal on the bank of the stream. Rice and sweet potatoes were boiled, and each diner received his portion in a coconut shell.

One member of the company came panting in from the jungle trailing an immense snake. It was welcomed with salvos of applause, and two dyaks seized it at either end and held it over the fire. After it had been cooked to a turn, the skin was stripped off and the meat was sliced, distributed and devoured with great relish.

Then another visit was made to the missionaries' home.

"May we sleep in your house tonight?" was the plea.

Permission was granted. As soon as it became dark sixty dyaks filed into one of the larger rooms of the house. They sat about quietly for a while, and then their leader began to train them in the war dance. They had heard of a war up in the hills and were on their way to take part in it. A little preliminary practice was needed. Man after man took the floor, thrust his sword at imaginary enemies, maneuvered his shield and worked his feelings up to a murderous pitch while the rest of the company clapped time and whooped their approval.

This continued long after bed-time. In the next room, separated by a thin partition with gaps between the boards, the Hoovers were vainly endeavoring to sleep. Finally the missionaries rose in despair. After a consultation, they opened up the little organ. They resolved to test the adage concerning the charms of music and the savage breast.

At the first sound of the gospel tunes there was a hush in the room beyond. This was followed by an excited jabbering. The leader came around to investigate the mysterious "singing box." He took back reassuring news. The stillness was profound as one tune after another was played. Each tune selected was a little slower and more drowsy than the last; and finally a chorus of soft snores began to sift through the cracks from the improvised dormitory.

The little organ had done its work.

TO TAME the "wild men of Borneo" with Sunday-school music is no slight accomplishment. For head-hunting is still the wild profession of inland dyaks, in spite of the efforts of government authorities to stop the practice. However, a white man's head is considered as of no use. The dyak believes that each person he beheads will become his servant in the next world, and white men are not supposed to make good servants.

A young man cannot win a bride until he has brought home a skull. The extent to which he is admitted into the rights of his tribe also depends upon the number of trophies hanging from the rafters of his hut. A woman's head is worth more than a man's, and a child's is still more valuable, because to secure either of these it is probable that the victor had to fight all the male protectors of the family.

But if a dyak, upon meeting you, shakes your right hand and at the same time presses an egg into your left, you need have no fear. That is a sign of friendship. In return if you can give some scissors or beads or pieces of chocolate, the bond is sealed. And a dyak is honorable—he will not break his bond.

The head of an accredited friend, once he has received the egg welcome, is safe no matter how desperately the dyak may need a skull to fill out his collection. The dyaks are very truthful and they make life miserable for anyone who proves false among them. They keep green the memory of his unfaithfulness by making a pile of branches on a path between villages, and each person who passes throws on a twig and curses the man in whose name the pile was erected.

If they tilled the soil as painstakingly as they throw twigs on disgrace-heaps, the dyaks would be rich. But the soil is so fertile that a bare living can be extracted from it with almost no cultivation. Thus laziness is encouraged.

However, the dyak, indolent though he may sometimes be, must yield the highest Weary Willie honors to the Malay. The incident of the Malay shopkeeper who closed up his shop on Tuesday night because he had enough money to last out the week is typical.

But like a swarm of locusts the active Chinese are now sweeping down into Malaysia. Frugal, industrious, ambitious, they carry everything before them.

Take, for example, the case of China Boy and the Malay tailor. The Malay had a dirty, dilapidated shop. He sat on the front step, not because he did not have an order. He had one, but could not decide whether to begin on it that day or the next. As he pondered, along came China Boy.

"Me work velly hard," said China Boy. "Sleep floor—little rice—no money—work velly hard."

He was taken into the shop on those terms. He swept, cleaned, repaired and soon began to help with needle and scissors. There came a time when China Boy did practically all the work while the Malay wandered down the street and drank up the shop's earnings. China Boy demanded—and got—a share in the profits from the increased business which he had secured. He saved. His boss spent. Finally China Boy astounded the Malay by offering to buy the shop. The deal was closed. China Boy is now a well-to-do merchant, while the Malay works as a porter in a Singapore hotel.

There is some truth in the ironical remark of the Chinese who said, "In Malaysia the Malays don't count."

Outsiders are streaming in to reap the harvests of wealth which the Malays and the wild tribes have ignored. The natural increase in Malaysia of 500,000 a year is about equaled by the number of immigrants who come in annually from India and China.

Fleeing from a famine-stricken land to a land where the richness of the soil makes famine impossible, the Chinese do not lose interest in their native country. When enterprises in China need money they can most easily get it not from residents of China, but from the wealthy Chinese nabobs of Malaysia. When Dr. Sun Yat Sen wanted to finance his revolution to make China a republic he sent his agents to Singapore where they obtained $2,000,000 in contributions from Chinese merchants.

AS CHINESE who come in contact with English-speaking people develop a "pidgin English" so the Chinese in Malaysia have developed a sort of "pidgin Malay" or "Baba Malay" as it is generally called. The odd thing about it is that this corrupt patois of Malay is now respected as the correct speech and anyone not speaking it is looked down upon as ignorant and untaught. The explanation is, of course, that the perverted language is respected because it is spoken by the prosperous Chinese, while the pure is spoken only by the condemned Malay. Thus it seems that the reputation of a language depends not upon its pedigree but upon the company it keeps.

Singapore, cross-roads of the Far East, is claimed by some to be the most cosmopolitan city in the world; but it is doubtful whether it excels in this respect Buenos Aires and New York. Seventy languages are spoken in its streets. There are others who assert that Singapore is the most wicked city in the world. Wickedness, however, is a hard thing to measure.

Certainly, Singapore has plenty of it.

Vice is cherished by Singapore because of the revenue it provides. Singapore is an open port. There are no duties except on opium and spirits. Therefore internal taxes must be levied to support the government. In 1913 government expenses amounted to about $10,500,000. There was a total revenue of $12,000,000. Of this $9,500,000 was raised through licenses, excise and vice taxation!

"The frontier of the Orient" describes Malaysia. It is invaded by pioneers and adventurers. Frontier conditions are

This is not, as you might suppose, a carnival side-show or a Coney Island attraction, but a Hindu temple in Singapore, cross-roads of the Far East apt to be rough. Steadying influences are needed in such regions.

Christian missions have a big task in this part of the world and are fulfilling it fairly well—in spots. One of the spots is the Anglo-Chinese school in Singapore, the largest educational institution in the Far East, outside of Japan.

That there is need for it is indicated by the fact that for Malaysia as a whole, only 3.9 per cent. of the men can read and only 1.9 per cent. of the women. Hardly one person in two thousand has more than a primary education.

Weird native medical practices make the demand for missionary doctors also very urgent.

"Your little girl appears to be very sick," said the missionary doctor to the mother of a little Siamese girl who showed symptoms of tuberculosis.

"Yes, she has pig's hairs," said the mother. "Somehow the pig's hairs have got into her system and are working their way toward her heart. If they get there they will stab it and she will die. But we are curing her."

"What are you doing?"

"Red chicken feathers," was the mother's reply. "We take a red chicken, boil it with its feathers on, then take the feathers off, put them in a bag, and rub her body."

Another favorite "cure" is rhinoceros tea. It is made by scraping rhinoceros hide into shavings and brewing them. It is regarded as a panacea. It will cure one thing quite as well as another. However, the patient sometimes gets well in spite of the stuff and then the tea is given the credit. The rhinoceros, being a strong animal, is supposed to impart his strength to the tea, and the precious rhinoceros hide sells for a dollar a square foot.

While the United States saves nine out of every ten babies—New Zealand nineteen out of twenty—more than half the babies of Siam and India-China die before they are two years old.

While we have in the United States a medical school for every million of population, Java has only two medical schools for thirty-six millions.

A REMARKABLE offer has been made to the mission boards by the Dutch Government. The Dutch will pay three-fourths of the cost of building and equipping hospitals if the missions will provide the remaining fourth and supply trained doctors and nurses. A denomination is taking advantage of this offer and plans to erect sixteen new hospitals in the next five years in the Dutch area.

Even the wheels of electric tram-cars have been worshipped in Siam, and the religions of Malaysia are a strange mixture, neither Buddhism nor Islam, flesh nor fowl. Mahomet would be shocked at the unveiled freedom of Mohammedan women in Malaysia. Religions have either been left at home by the wanderers who have come to this part of the world or else have suffered a sea change in transit. To what faith, for example, could belong so weird an oath as the following:

"May the blood drop from my body; may my head

A powerful Dyak chief

break in two; may the crocodiles devour me; may I be compelled to carry water in wicker baskets to quench the flames of hell; may I suffer the most horrible tortures until my years are as many as the grains of sand by the sea, if I violate this, my solemn oath."

The tramp-like wanderlust of the people makes mission work a bit difficult. At least thirty per cent. of the Christian church members move every year. But apparently they take their new religion with them. One man converted the entire village to which he went. Another won a whole colony of four hundred cocoanut growers in West Borneo. In supposedly "unoccupied" islands the missionaries are continually meeting itinerant Christians who are serving as volunteer missionaries wherever they go.

A GREAT future lies before this frontier country of the East. The ancient spice trade is gone because people have learned how to refrigerate with ice, thus making it unnecessary to disguise the flavor of food with spice. But greater industries have taken its place. The world buys vast quantities of Malaysia's cocoanut meat or "copra" to make nut butter. In the establishment of the copra industry, which opens up possibilities of wealth even greater than those brought about by the world's ever increasing demand for rubber, and which far surpasses in extent the spice trade of olden days, the Christian missionary has been an important factor.

About the middle of the last century, when Malay pirates still were continuing their devastating raids, two zealous missionaries established themselves on some of the smaller islands under the Dutch flag. The preaching of the gospel was not enough; to make their work effective they must improve economic conditions for the natives. So they planted cocoanuts and instructed the wretched natives in planting them. They induced the Dutch authorities to war on the pirates until those dreaded marauders had been effectively suppressed. And the result has been described as "one of the most marvelous transformations on the face of the earth, from thriftlessness, starvation and constant fear of enslavement, to peace and plenty. Now all through these islands there are huge cocoanut plantations, and everywhere copra is to be seen drying in the bright sunlight."

Copra however, holds no monopoly on the production of wealth in these fertile islands. Two-thirds of the world's tin comes from Malaysia. The second greatest oil company in the world has its rich oil-fields there. Rice will grow as high as a man's head, and the soil is so fertile and the territory so vast that a population as large as that of India could be accommodated without difficulty. Singapore is already the world's eighth seaport, far surpassing Liverpool in volume of shipping.

We do not hear much about Malaysia, for it is a pioneer land. At one time Europe had not heard much about America. But it is well to watch pioneer lands. Malaysia is destined to play an important rôle in future history.

Bluebirds for Sparrows

By ADELINE THAYER THOMPSON

Home of two bluebird families rows would swoop down upon our beloved bluebirds, driving them away, and immediately take possession of the boxes themselves.

We tried everything we could think of and that was suggested in our effort to rid ourselves of the sparrows and keep the bluebirds. We spent hours climbing up and down a ladder removing straws and feathers the miserable sparrows had carried in to the boxes; we invested in a sparrow trap; we bought an air-gun, using valuable time that should have been spent on housework in shooting at the sparrows whenever they appeared near the bird houses; we threw stones by the score; but in spite of all we could do, the sparrows continued steadily to build. To be sure, we accomplished something, in that the moment we opened the door the sparrows would scatter in every direction, but regarding any lasting effect, it made not the slightest difference in their persistence.

Then we sold our home with its wealth of old trees, moving to a bungalow built on a small lot close to the street, and possessing but one tree, which marked the front border-line along one side; its branches overshadowing the public walk in the foreground.

MORE for sentimental reasons than anything else, we had brought one of our bluebird boxes with us. And though it was set in place, in our only tree, with very little hope that the bluebirds would think of moving into a home occupying such a conspicuous place—every passerby having to walk immediately beneath the tree—even if the detested sparrows would allow them to build.

Early in the spring, however, the bluebirds arrived, apparently minding not at all either the location regarding the street, or the very close proximity to our porch, which was only about ten feet removed. We were beside ourselves with joy, just as we always had been when they had appeared. Our delight was as short-lived also, for the sparrows, just as of yore, succeeded in driving the bluebirds away.

This time we were desperate! And after going through the same worn-out attempts again and again to keep the sparrows from nesting we decided that if the bluebirds could not have the box the sparrows certainly should not have possession! Thereupon, we ascended the much-worn ladder and promptly filled the four holes of our keg-shaped box with tightly rolled pieces of newspaper. The sparrows, of course did their best to remove the paper, but after repeated attempts flew off to nest elsewhere, leaving the bluebird box unmolested.

After a month or two, we had all but forgotten the existence of the bluebird box, when one morning early in July, we saw a flash of blue near the bird-house! We could hardly believe our eyes, but sure enough, a pair of bluebirds were actually there hovering around the apertures that were tightly wadded with paper! It took us but a few moments, you may be sure, to procure the ladder and remove the papers, and shortly we were rewarded by seeing the birds return, the male bird quivering and fluttering his wings in an ecstasy of delight, singing all the while a low, wooing melody of intoxicating sweetness as his mate circled about the openings to the box, and then bursting into a veritable song of triumph when she finally alighted at one of the holes and flew inside! We were as excited I am sure as he was. And joy beyond words! There wasn't a sparrow in sight.

THE birds took possession at once, carrying soft grasses to form the nest, the female bird doing all of the nest-making, but the male working equally as hard in that he accompanied her on each quest for material, returning with her to the box each time, and regaling her with melodies. After the bluebirds had possession of the box the sparrow held not the slightest terror for them, the male bird especially developing, wonderful prowess, fiercely and boldly driving every intruder away. The eggs were laid and hatched within two weeks, and the last week in July saw five little bluebirds fly out into the air and sunshine.

Within two or three days after the young birds had flown away, another pair of bluebirds, or, the same pair, begun building a nest in one of the other apartments in the box! Yes, and they laid their eggs and raised their precious brood within ten feet of our porch where we were watching them delightedly, just as the pair had done the month previous! Our experiment had far exceeded our expectations, so much so, indeed, that it seemed as if other bird lovers should hear all about it.

Evidently the trick in gaining the bluebirds is not so much in the location of their houses as in giving them protection from the sparrow. And further, to feel no discouragement if the bluebird does not take possession of houses early in the season, but to keep the houses closed that the bluebirds may find them unoccupied by their enemies when they are ready for their second, or possibly third brood in midsummer.

Proximity to the street failed to deter bird homebuilders

Summer in Rayagadda

A Story of India

By EVA ROBERTS WOOD

Illustrated by Brown Martin

ALL NIGHT long Ameliamma had fanned the white woman, until her fingers were cramped from the monotonous waving of the huge palm leaf.

The English woman slept soundly, and appeared to be smiling in her sleep, a fact which particularly irritated the native. Smiles! What right had Madam to happiness when Ameliamma was so full of woe?

The big brown eyes of the Hindu girl opened their widest and jets of wrath illumined them, as she thought of her own stormy, hapless existence. Then, as a new inspiration seemed to spring from her unhappy musings, the dark eyes narrowed, peering through half-closed lids heavy with a black fringe. For minutes she debated, torn between fear and longing, and then determination took full possession of her. She would have that slender bit of gold which rose and fell on the white breast of the sleeper, for surely it was the secret of the missionary's joy. However vaguely the story of the Cross had been transmitted to the Hindu girl's idol-dimmed vision, of one thing she was quite sure—that the Cross and smiles were closely connected.

AMELIAMMA had been born fourteen years before, in a settlement on the outskirts of Rayagadda. Her mother had died of cholera when Ameliamma was ten years old, and as the child seemed only a burden to the Hindu father, he had grimly arranged to marry her off to a young Telugu, a water-carrier for the cantonment, and cruel with the cruelty of heathenism. To this dark-skinned fellow the child-wife had gone with no emotion in her tiny breast; since it was the road appointed for her, she had to tread it. As the months had rolled into years, and the estate of wifehood had not broadened to motherhood, the vengeance of the irate husband had known no cessation, so that the apathetic attitude of the child-wife had changed to hatred and only a primitive sense of humor had saved her from utter hopelessness.

To Ameliamma, even in her blackest despair, there was usually something funny in the drastic measures of her big, angry husband. If Kodiak beat her and the lash broke, the joke was on Kodiak, who would be too lazy to obtain another for that occasion. Or if, during a period when he denied her food and doubled his own gluttonous proportions, he was seized with colicky pains, then Ameliamma grinned inwardly—any outward display of mirth was irritating to Kodiak's nerves. His beastly threats she found amusing rather than terrifying, because he made himself so ridiculous, puffing out his cheeks, twisting his mouth and tilting his nose, while strutting about like an infuriated animal.

However, even this saving grace failed to make Ameliamma's life other than a dreary round of drudgery and torture. There were times when she felt that she would like to snatch from the stars their right to twinkle; and this was one of those times, yet tonight the coveted joy was not in the stars, but rather within her reach.

THE torrid heat of India's lowland was upon them; today the white woman would be going to the foothills of the Eastern Ghats, while Ameliamma would be left behind to droop, as great tongues of fire lapped the plains and huge nostrils exhaled sultry air over the sweltering Indian village.

Morning was breaking in the eastern horizon. Ameliamma bent over the sleeper, and with one hand moved the fan in jerky, irregular waves, while the fingers of the other closed over the tiny gold cross and a thumb nail snapped the bit of a clasp. Hurriedly she tied the emblem in her clothing. Madam stirred, but the native shook the fan to its utmost velocity.

As the sun rose, the drowsy village began to stir. An elephant, owned by an aged Brahman priest and to be used in some sacred rite, was being driven to water. The mail-carrier was approaching, his jingling metal anklets clanking with every dogtrot step, after running all night to bring the mail to the village. In the distance a squatty cart, drawn by two bullocks, was winding around the bend of the road.

For an instant Ameliamma watched the approach of the bobbing vehicle being pulled along by the clumsy, swaying beasts; then she dropped the palm leaf and shook the white woman: "Madam, the cartmen! They come!"

Madam blinked: "So early?"

The maid moved quickly, arranging clothing for Madam's immediate use: "Hurry! Madam, they wait badly."

The English woman sprang to her feet: "The water? Did the boy bring it?"

"No, Madam, he did not come," the girl replied. "It is suntha, he has much to sell. The cartmen, perhaps they have things to buy, or sell; and to wait makes them angry." Ameliamma, in her anxiety to have Madam away as soon as possible, had developed an abnormal interest in the bartering of the villagers—suntha being one day in the week when the people of several settlements came together to exchange their produce and wares.

The straightforward, penetrating gaze of the English woman disconcerted the guilty girl; she dashed out of sight for a moment and returned with a bucket of water and a towel.

While Madam hurried into her garments, the apprehensive maid rolled the sleeping-mat. The white woman did not relish this hurried process of departure. "Really, Ameliamma, I must eat!" she protested.

The native's brow furrowed; she was sorry indeed that Madam must stop to eat. Then clutching at a seemingly happy solution, she ventured: "Fruit? You'll carry to eat on the way?"

Now the missionary was properly vexed. "Why, it is dreadful that I should be hurried like this! Try to persuade the cartmen that there is plenty of time; everything is packed and ready, and the sun is not yet high."

In a moment Ameliamma appeared with some fruit and a bowl of cold tree, but that was long ago, and the furrows from the lash still showed on her back. It was better, she had decided, that he should have the money.

Dreadfully the Hindu wife went about her housekeeping tasks, while Kodiak greedily devoured his morning meal. The coffee bowl he drained, but a few crumbs of hard bread, which he had discovered to be not quite to his liking, he returned to the jar; to these his wife was almost welcome. Of the rice which she was pounding, he would know just how much was eaten, for he had all but counted the kernels.

A bit later as Kodiak swung down the road toward the cantonment, his wife watched him from the corners of her eyes, and chuckled to herself; for it didn't really matter about the coffee and bread that morning, as Madam had allowed her to stuff her empty little stomach with fruit. So Ameliamma threw herself on a straw mat, and in spite of heat and husband was soon fast asleep.

A flash of a dream and then the tired girl was awakened by neighbors on their way to the river for water. Sleepy and hot, Ameliamma gathered the few washable articles of which the household boasted, took up her waterpot and joined the women.

THE days passed in grinding monotony. When alone and sure no one could spy upon her, Ameliamma took the stolen treasure from the folds of her garment and stared at it in perplexity; for through some twist of Fate life had been less cloudy since the wonderful gold had been hers and in its possession she felt a sort of secret triumph.

But one day at the river, as Ameliamma pounded away to the rhythm of a score of other toilers who stretched their fabrics on a stone and pounded them with another smaller stone, a cartman brought his oxen to drink. He had come from the hills and had news of Madam. In the ascent of one of the treacherous cliffs, a usually sure-footed coolie had slipped and Madam had been injured by the fall.

Ameliamma stopped her pounding and stared at the man with troubled eyes; involuntarily her hand went to the knot in the end of the sash which girded her body. The girl stepped nearer to the news-bearer: "Is Madam much hurt?"—"Can she walk?"—"Can she smile?"—she jerked out, in short-cut Telugu.

After the oxen had dragged their solemn bulk back to the highway the now frightened girl stood motionless with her big brown eyes fixed on the hills. No adequate sense of wrong over the purloining of the coveted emblem entered her mind, but still there was an uncanny sensation of a slip in fortunes, and it troubled her. Mechanically she finished her laundry work; lowered a water-jar into the river and lifted it to her shoulder.

As Ameliamma picked her way back to the hut she recalled how one day, when she had wondered at Madam's smiles and spoken of the cross, the English woman had placed a hand upon her head and looking intently into her eyes had said: "Ameliamma, if I could only make it clear to you that it is not really this bit of gold that is the wonder worker. This is merely a reminder, a message; like a letter from one who loves, telling me of His great love and forgiveness. You must know Him before the symbol can mean much to you, dear one." Strangely enough the native remembered each word that the English woman had so carefully carved in Telugu.

But ages of darkness and idol worship were not easily penetrated, and the Hindu girl was still possessed of but one thought: the cross was a magic charm, a sort of lucky piece, which lightened burdens and brought joy to the wearer. Now Madam was in trouble and could not smile—the cartman had been coffee. Madam looked relieved. "How disappointing Midno is not to come when he is needed so much. You would not fail me, would you, Ameliamma?" she questioned.

The native clutched at her clothing, twisted the knot tied over the bit of gold and gingerly wagged her head, "No." But dismal forebodings were settling upon her, for surely Madam had missed the gold from her neck. Already the stolen treasure was proving a burden.

YET in a few minutes the white woman was being jogged along the road on the first stage of her journey and Ameliamma was dragging her sleepy little body over the zigzag path to the dingy straw-thatched hut where her husband was waiting.

Kodiak met his wife with an ugly grimace of general disapproval, ranting and raving at her in Telugu, which blending of euphony in no way softened the attack. The few rupees which Madam had given to Ameliamma as her monthly wage, she handed to him. Once she had hidden them in the branches of a mango

Allies Demand Twelve Billion Gold Marks from Germany

NEW pressure on Germany to force acceptance of the Allies' reparations program was begun with the despatch to Berlin by the Reparations Commission of a note demanding the payment before March 23 of 1,000,000,000 gold marks—$250,000,000—and the completion by May 1 of the payment of 20,000,000,000 gold marks, as provided in Article 235 of the Versailles treaty.

Germany has contended that the value of materials already turned over to the Allies was 21,000,000,000 marks, and that she thus has settled the account; but the Commission estimated the value at not more than 8,000,000,000 marks, which would mean that the Berlin government must raise 12,000,000,000 marks in a few weeks. There was no expectation that Germany could pay this sum in specie, and the Commission granted until April 1 for suggestions for payment in other ways than in specie or credits abroad. Failure of Germany to meet the demand for 1,000,000,000 marks by April 23 would give the Allies a stronger legal basis for drastic action against Germany under the treaty than they had after the breaking up of the London conference.

The Commission's demand was calculated to make the German people realize that the Allies fully intend to enforce the letter of the treaty if Germany rejects compromise proposals and maintains her attitude of passive resistance to the indemnity proposals determined upon in Paris. On May 1 the Reparations Commission must notify Germany of the reparations total; and, while no official announcement has been made, it was said that the total would be 550,000,000,000 gold marks, or two and one-half times the sum fixed at Paris. The highest figure suggested at the Allied conferences was 5,000,000,000 gold marks annually from Germany. Allied officials were fixing the tariff line in the Rhine section and preparing for a firm enforcement of that portion of the penalties decreed at London.

Premier Briand, defending before the French Chamber of Deputies his course at London, predicted that if the Allies remained united Germany would discover resources which would surprise even Berlin. He declared Germany was dreaming of gaining by industrial imperialism what she failed to gain by military imperialism, and to this end was trying to cheat France and the other Allies of their dues. He promised that the program of penalties would not be abandoned until Germany had given a satisfactory settlement not only on reparations but on disarmament and the punishment of war criminals. He received an ovation from the Chamber and won by 491 to 66 on a vote of confidence.

Anglo-Russian Trade Pact Signed

THE much-discussed trade agreement providing for the resumption of commercial relations between Great Britain and Soviet Russia has been signed in London and in some quarters has been interpreted as forecasting full British recognition of the Bolshevik government. The agreement is virtually the same as that taken to Moscow in January by Leonid Krassin, Soviet minister of trade and commerce, and pledges each country not to impose any form of blockade or any trade discriminations not imposed on other countries. Telegraphic and postal facilities will be arranged and freedom of navigation is mutually promised.

An important section provides that each party shall refrain from hostile action or propaganda against the other's institutions, and the Bolsheviks pledge themselves to refrain from any encouragement of Asiatic peoples to action against British interests, especially in Asia Minor, Persia, Afghanistan and India. Gold exported from Russia in payment for exports will not be exempt from seizure to pay British claims, and its ownership will be determined by the ordinary procedure of British courts.

Britain acted alone in concluding a pact with Russia, and the French Government maintained its opposition to any dealings with the Soviet régime. French officials believed the agreement was unworkable and that the exchange of goods resulting from it would be negligible, inasmuch as Russia lacks goods for export and the ownership of the gold in Soviet control is in dispute. It enabled Premier Lloyd George to strengthen his position at home, however, by placating radical elements and by putting Britain in a position to outdistance trade rivals when Russia can resume commercial relations.

The Soviet government and Poland have concluded their peace negotiations and the treaty has been signed by the representatives of the two countries.

Viviani Coming to America

EUROPE'S eagerness to have the new American administration an active participant in the settlement of the problems growing out of the World War has become more apparent day by day, and important negotiations already are in progress. France is particularly anxious and through Paul Jusserand, her ambassador, has informed President Harding that René Viviani, former Premier and head of the French War Mission to the United States in 1917, is coming to Washington "with good wishes" from the French Government. That his mission would be limited to the expression of good wishes was credited by none, especially since M. Jusserand's conference with Mr. Harding regarding the visit lasted for an hour, time enough for a considerable discussion of international affairs.

Paris despatches stated that M. Viviani would be authorized to ask on behalf of the Council of the League of Nations whether the United States would consent to enter the League if Article X is stricken from the covenant, and to set forth conditions which he believed would make it easy for America to join. French official opinion was that the Allies cannot abandon the League or the covenant, because it is inseparably interwoven with the execution of the Versailles Treaty; but France was ready to make al-

President Harding has indicated a belief that it was the first duty of his administration to set domestic affairs in order and therefore since March 4 has given no definite line on details of his program for foreign affairs.

Kronstadt Rebels Scattered

THE great fortress of Kronstadt, near Petrograd, which has been in revolt against the Soviet government, has been captured by the Bolsheviks after severe fighting and its defenders either made prisoners or scattered widely. The Revolutionary Committee, with General Koslovsky, the leader of the revolt, and 800 soldiers fled to Finland.

For several days the Kronstadt uprising assumed proportions which threatened the loss of Petrograd to the Bolsheviks; but Leon Trotzky, the Soviet war minister, massed the entire new Seventh Army, the strength of which was estimated at 60,000, against the 15,000 mutineers. A determined assault was made, and after several hours of fighting, in which machine-gun and artillery fire caused heavy losses, the Bolsheviks forced an entrance into the town. There the Kronstadt communists joined in the fighting, but the rebels were able to repel the attack. Meanwhile near-by defenses had been captured by the Bolsheviks and the defenders of the fortress were not able to withstand another assault.

Before retreating the rebels blew up the warships Petropavlovsk and Sebastopol, which Trotzky had been particularly anxious to save. The destruction of property during the fighting was enormous, and fires occurred over an area of many miles.

The anti-Bolshevist outbreaks in southern Russia were reported to be spreading at a rapid rate, but the meagre and often contradictory despatches made it impossible to determine the strength of the various movements. The entire Odessa garrison was said to have joined the revolutionists, and Soviet troops on the Roumanian frontier were ordered back to the Ukraine to suppress uprisings. The lack of a great leader to unite the foes of the Bolsheviks gave the Moscow government a great advantage and lessened the chances that the outbreaks would gain decisive proportions.

Dr. Zayas Wins in Cuba

PARTIAL elections in Cuban district where the returns of the November presidential elections had been thrown out because of fraud charges resulted in the election of Dr. Alfredo Zayas y Aledo to the Presidency, but under conditions which accentuated the bitterness of the political strife in the republic. Members of the Liberal Party, whose candidate was General Gomez, obeyed the order of its Executive Committee against participation in the balloting and in the four provinces outside of Havana where elections were held only forty-two Liberal ballots for President were cast as against 12,419 for Dr. Zayas.

Under the oversight of Major-General Enoch H. Crowder, the special representative of the American Government, every precaution had been taken to prevent violence and fraud, and election day passed without disorders. General Crowder made an inspection tour of several provinces and kept a close watch to prevent a recurrence of the partisan clashes which caused several fatalities at the November elections.

The Executive Committee of the Liberal party has ordered Liberal members of Congress to abstain from all official duties and also has ordered all Liberals holding minor offices "on strike"—their hope evidently being to force action by the American Government. They prepared to offer strenuous protests against the acceptance of the election returns. Dr. Zayas predicted that the situation would clear in a short time, and expressed confidence that enough members of Congress would take their seats to form a quorum, proclaim his election and enable him to constitute a successful government on May 20.

Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus Dies

DR. FRANK W. GUNSAULUS, for twenty years pastor of the Central Congregational Church and since 1893 president of the Armour Institute of Technology in Chicago, died at his home there, following a severe heart attack. Aside from his educational work, Dr. Gunsaulus had won fame as a writer on religious subjects, and was the author of several volumes of poems. Some of his articles were published in the Christian Herald.

Give Love a Chance!

HAVE you ever stopped to think how many things this old world has used and admired and worshipped which have proved to be absolutely worthless when a great crisis arose to test their value?

The world believed in the power of Commerce and Money. They could not stop the war.

The world believed in Culture. It did not stop the war.

The world thought a great deal of Art. It was powerless to stop the passions of men.

The world worshipped Science and boasted of its greatness. And Science used its skill to invent new ways of killing more people.

The world counted on Music to soothe the savage breast. And Music fled in fear before war's trumpet.

The world was proud of its Ecclesiasticism and covered Europe over with Cathedrals. And all the so-called Religion and Architecture of Ritual went down like a child's sandpiles when the tidal wave of Hate came rushing in over the shore of man's selfishness.

Money, Culture, Art, Science, Music and Ecclesiasticism all failed to stop the flood of Hate and Race Feeling and Greed in men's hearts.

And they always will fail.

Why not give Love a chance? Love is the only thing in the world that could have stopped the war. And the world did not give Love a chance.

Everything else fails to conquer passion.

Love never faileth.

Give Love a Chance!

The Historian in Exile

IN THE quietude of his exile in Holland the ex-Kaiser has been writing his literary memoirs at leisure for many months past. We learn by the cable that in these reminiscences he claims that the idea of a league of nations originated in his brain as long ago as 1905. It is easy to make such a claim, but very difficult to support it with acceptable evidence.

Count Witte in his memoirs refers to the messages that passed between the Kaiser and the Czar, but these pointed to nothing more than a league between the two nations for mutual defense in the event of war. Philip Scheidemann, Germany's Secretary of State, and Chancellor when the war broke out, in his lately completed history of the war, "The Collapse," makes no mention of any episode that can be construed as showing that the Kaiser had such a project in view as a peace league or league of nations; Scheidemann was a vigilant observer and careful recorder. When Austria delivered her ultimatum to Serbia, he tells us how he began to keep a diary. Personally, he was strongly for peace, but was outvoted at every turn.

Fortunately, the facts concerning the League of Nations and its origin are not difficult to ascertain. The original suggestion seems unquestionably to have belonged to Jean de Bloch (1836-1902), a Polish banker, statistician and administrator. He was a Jew, born and educated in Warsaw. His statistical work attracted the attention of the Russian Government and his political advancement followed. M. Bloch wrote a number of books, the most notable being "The War of the Future"—which appeared in 1898, and the following year was translated into English and several other European languages. In it he showed that war between the great powers was no longer possible as the arbiter of international disputes. The next wars, he predicted, would be long, and would result in economic exhaustion, starvation of the masses and dislocation of the social fabric, leaving the great nations practically bankrupt.

Perhaps the most conclusive evidence of the effect of those warnings is seen in the fact that, within twelve months after "The War of the Future" appeared (1898), the first Hague Peace Conference assembled in response to a rescript issued by Czar Nicholas II. Practically all the governments who were invited accepted the invitation. The final act of the conference was signed and completed in 1899, twenty-six nations becoming the signatories. This was the first League of Nations, and it was not until many years later, or in 1905, that according to the ex-Kaiser's test recollections, he first formulated the have Mague!

Page 254 ¹ now for the exile of Doorn to set up he had ever attempted the rôle of less that he had originated the League of Nations. The history of the war can not be changed as the facts—even including the final discussion in Berlin when the decision was made—are all well attested matters of record. But in not a single instance has any historian of the war made record of an effort on the part of Wilhelm to avert the conflict either by a league or any other combination in the interest of world-peace. Indeed it does not appear that he ever took any step to avert the struggle which sacrificed millions of lives and brought down destruction on Germany and her allies.

Wait and See

A REAL wave of protest has swept over the country against the bad films and their producers, including the companies, the authors, the theater managers and all those State Censor boards that have failed to censor.

One of the largest film companies in America writes the Christian Herald as follows:

"Motion picture producers are bending their earnest efforts toward a high standard. You will be pleased to learn that almost the entire industry has joined with us in our effort to remove objectionable or offensive films and with the co-operation of the public we hope to achieve great things."

We take this as a sincere and honest promise. It is the business of all the film people now to make good this promise to the protesting public.

Wait and see!

For National Reconsecration

PRESIDENT HARDING is a Christian, and he is not ashamed to have the whole world know it. Weeks before his inauguration and shortly after election, he stated his religious belief at a meeting of laymen in Marion in these words:

"I want you to believe that there is an individual who believes in the reconsecration of a religious republic. I have for my inheritance a Christian belief, and I have in my veins the blood of Christian parentage. I have been preaching to my countrymen the gospel of reverence. I do not believe that we can have the highest type of civilization without its religious strain. We need its influence, and its discipline."

"Sometimes I think that the world is adrift from its moorings of religion, and I know it will help if there come a great renewal of faith. I have no higher concept in the world than a just government, and I do not see how a government can exist in the world without coming in contact with God. I could not hope for a happy relationship among nations if there is not the same current of recognition of the Supreme Being. I do not think that any association of nations could be successful in which God is not recognized."

In his inaugural, when he spoke to an audience of 30,000 and beyond and above them to this whole nation, he made this avowal:

"Here are a hundred millions, with common concern and shared responsibility, answerable to God and country. The Republic summons them to their duty and I invite co-operation. I accept my part with single-mindedness of purpose and humility of spirit, and implore the favor and guidance of God in His heaven. . . . I have taken the solemn oath of office on that passage of Holy Writ wherein it is asked: 'What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy and walk humbly with thy God.' This I plight to God and country."

In these days when decadence in religion is becoming so marked in many places, it is reassuring for the Christian people of America to have this plain statement of faith from the new Executive. Many readers of the Christian Herald will recall the famous challenge which was issued by Ingersoll in which he made the assertion that infidelity, or at least indifference, toward the Christian faith had become increasingly a characteristic of the American people, and that even those in the highest official stations had become indifferent. It was a challenge to the nation. The Christian Herald took up the challenge and asked for an expression of faith from those in high places. Responses came from the President, the Supreme Court, the Cabinet, a large proportion of both Houses of Congress and leading college Presidents and educators, with the result that the vaunt of Ingersoll received a conclusive negative.

We believe that a similar test, tried today, would upset the representations of the secular press as to growing indifference to religion as effectually as was done in the time of McKinley. And we have confidence to believe that the aspirations of President Harding for a national religious reconsecration are generally shared by a very large majority of those foremost in the councils of our people now.

"Spotted Town"

"YES," says THE YOUNG BLOOD who lives in Spotted Town, "we are getting tired of all these reform movements. Pretty soon we won't be allowed to breathe without an ordinance. The reformers have taken away our harmless beer and wine; they are trying to censor the snappy shows off the stage; they are passing anti-cigarette laws; they want people to spend Sunday going to church instead of to the ball game; they want to make divorce harder to get; they are a pest and a nuisance! The reformers make me tired! Sticking their noses into other peoples' business and interfering with our personal liberty. There ought to be a movement started to wipe the reformers off the map of this town."

"Same here," says THE OLD-TIMER. "The reformers are a nuisance. Why can't they leave us alone? We have a tidy little town here. It may not be heaven on earth, but it is good enough for us. I say to these men and women who want to regulate our affairs, 'If you want to keep busy, move to Africa or China where they need reforming. But leave us alone here in Spotted Town. It's good enough for us.'"

We wonder how many of the people who live in Spotted Towns all over this land feel like The Young Blood and The Old Timer. A good many, no doubt. No one loves a Christian reformer. From the time of the prophets down to men like Anthony Comstock and women like Lucy Page Gaston, the civilized world has disliked the people who want to make things better. All the people who live in Spotted Town are not bad people, but nearly all of them, including The Young Blood and The Old Timer, want to be "let alone," and they resent more or less stoutly anything that looks like an interference with their "personal liberty," as if there were any such thing apart from the safety of the public.

It would be well to ask The Young Blood and The Old Timer in Spotted Town where we would all be today if some one had not taken upon himself the disagreeable task of reforming the old world. It would be interesting to know what kind of a world we would be living in right now in our Spotted Towns if the following people had not tried to reform them: Here are some of the people who have helped to clean up Spotted Towns:

Elijah, Isaiah, and all the Prophets, Paul of Tarsus, and all the Christians who turned the world upside down, Augustine, Francis of Assisi, Savonarola, Huss, Wycliff, John Knox, Luther, the Pilgrims who went out from the Puritans to make a new world, Elizabeth Fry, Florence Nightingale, Howard, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Wendell Phillips, Garrison, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Henry Ward Beecher, Frederick Douglass, Abraham Lincoln, Booker Washington, Theodore Roosevelt, and—the names are countless, of whom the world, and Spotted Towns in particular, are not worthy. Surely it would be a queer world if all the reformers had never lived. We doubt if even The Young Blood and The Old Timer would find Spotted Town an agreeable residence if some one did not exist to make the place more or less "SPOTLESS." Nevertheless, Spotted Town wants to be let alone. "It is good enough for us," say The Young Blood and The Old Timer.

Where the Income Tax Goes

NOW that the loyal citizen has paid his Federal income tax, he will be interested in knowing how Uncle Sam proposes to dispose of the money. There has been a good deal of wild guessing on this subject, but all doubts are now set at rest by a statement issued from Chief Herbert E. Brown, U. S. Bureau of Efficiency, which tells us just how far each dollar goes, and the different purposes to which it is devoted. This is his list:

Wars, pensions, compensation, interest on public debt, expenses incurred during federal control of railroads	$0.68
Army and Navy	.20
Salaries of President, Vice-President, Congress, Supreme Court and all other federal officers, harbor improvements, good roads, education	.12

This analysis is based on the appropriations for the fiscal year 1921, those for 1922 being still incomplete. The apportionment given above, however, will not vary more than a few points for the coming year. A dollar goes a long way in this case, and when we count in the thousands of millions, it is a big reckoning. But every intelligent citizen wants to know just what is done with his income tax and now, with the figures given above, it should not be difficult for each to figure out the problem for himself.

Building a City of Content

How One Manufacturer Seeks to Solve the Labor Problem

By DANIEL V. SMITH

WHAT must the big manufacturer of today do before starting to turn out his product? In almost every case the answer is—find a site with good transportation facilities, buy enough land for a factory, build the plant, then advertise for help.

That, however, was not the procedure of C. Harold Wills, who is manufacturing a new automobile of his own design. Mr. Wills refused to look at his tremendous task of production with the eyes of the calculating, profit-seeking business man. Instead, he approached his problem from a more humanitarian point of view—from the standpoint of practical Christianity.

He had been a laborer himself and he realized that workmen were to be treated not as mere factors or machines, if they were to be made content, but as human beings of flesh, blood and soul. His procedure, the result of kindly, Christian thinking, was to prepare to produce his motor cars by making sure of happy living conditions for the men and women who would make such a production possible.

He did this by building a whole city before even laying the foundations for his automobile plant. This "City of Contented Living," as it is called by its founders and inhabitants, is Marysville, Michigan, on the St. Clair River, above Detroit.

Mr. Wills gave long, hard study to the questions of how the workmen who were to build his car were to be made most efficient, and under what conditions they would work best. His conclusion was that workmen are most efficient when they are contented. He then studied the causes for discontent among workmen.

A frequent cause for lessened efficiency on the part of workmen, Mr. Wills saw, was the discontent of their families. If their wives and children were not happy in their life and surroundings, this reacted on the workmen. In an investigation Mr. Wills found that the greatest causes for discontent among the families of workmen were living in small, ill-lighted, unsanitary, crowded houses, with no places for the children to play, poor school facilities and lack of interest in the community.

"Let us begin to build a motor car, then, by building a 'City of Contented Living,'" said Mr. Wills.

So far Mr. Wills's effort, a broad, idealistic, yet practical attempt to bring about a better relation between his capital and his labor, has been entirely successful and beautifully agreeable to him and his workers.

AT THE age of twelve, Mr. Wills began as an apprentice in a machine shop. By night study and constant looking ahead he became an expert draughtsman and designer and finally found himself chief engineer and manufacturing manager of one of the biggest automobile plants in the world. And from that he advanced to the formation of his own company.

Then the big problem of Wills's life confronted him.

How was he to manufacture his car in great numbers? Mr. Wills's experience, from mechanic to manager, had taught him that the greatest difficulty to surmount in the problem of manufacturing was the labor question. Especially this is true, he was aware, in the automobile industry, where he estimated eighty-five per cent. of production cost goes to labor.

The city of Detroit had become so congested that it was evident that Mr. Wills could not build his automobile factory there and satisfy his ideas of properly treated labor. So he looked for building sites elsewhere, yet sufficiently near that motor-car center.

Mr. Wills had often anchored his yacht in cruising along the St. Clair River off a point of land near the mouth at a little, sleeping, cross-roads hamlet, called Marysville. The natural beauty of the place had always remained in his mind. The high river banks, the slope of the land from the river to a considerable elevation, the excellent natural drainage, all combined to make a beautiful, healthful place.

When he started to look for factory sites, it was natural that Mr. Wills should remember Marysville. With his business partner, John R. Lee, he inspected the whole locality more in detail. With its natural adaptability for the location of healthful homes were combined potential shipping facilities and proximity to railroads that might even rival those of Detroit. Here, indeed, was the site for the "City of Contented Living"—and working.

Immediately, Mr. Wills, Mr. Lee and their associates bought 4,200 acres of land in and around the village of Marysville, including a waterfront on the St. Clair River of $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Twenty or thirty acres would have been sufficient to build an automobile factory, but Mr. Wills's high ideal was to build not just a plant, but the environment for that plant.

The company was duly incorporated, organized and well financed. The next step was the planning of the construction of model living surroundings.

Experts studied a number of model industrial communities for Mr. Wills. They reported in detail on housing facilities, width of streets, park areas and similar features. In his plans Mr. Wills combined the best features of these communities and in many cases improved upon them. The minimum for Marysville's streets was set at 60 feet. One-third of the whole area of Marysville is devoted to play-grounds, boulevards, and parks. The smallest building lot is 40 feet wide by 120 feet deep.

WITH the plans completed, seventy-five engineers began to lay out model Marysville. Hundreds of other men felled timber on the land. Streets and sidewalks were built, sewers constructed, gas and water-mains laid and electric lights installed.

When all the fundamental facilities of a city were installed work was begun on the dwellings for Mr. Wills's first employees.

At the same time an auditorium seating 1,500 persons was built. It was erected in a single day with everybody working together. In this were provided the best moving pictures and amusements. Workmen were organized into entertainment groups. One of the first steps in this work was the formation of the Half-Shell Club. The Half-Shell, symbolic of open and above-board square dealing, was chosen as the name of this club on the inference that an unworthy oyster is readily discovered on the half-shell.

The Half-Shell Club meets every other Monday night and to it are attracted many of the best speakers in the country, leaders in professional and business activities. This club and all its features of entertainment was in operation before the foundation for the Wills plant was laid. Not until complete provision had been made for the entertainment, health, and general contentment of living of his employees did Mr. Wills begin work on the first of the three units of his great plant.

A great portion of Marysville's workers are unmarried men. To provide quarters for them, four community houses have been built, each accommodating 56 men, with a big assembly room, shower baths and all modern conveniences. A central dining-room seats 400 people. These community houses are more complete than most college dormitories.

On the day it was announced that Mr. Wills was to build his new plant at Marysville six other manufacturers asked him to sell them land near his own site whereon to build plants of their own. Five of these have already started construction.

The city of Marysville is now incorporated. Besides completion of streets, boulevards and park areas, miles of water-mains, sewers and sidewalks have been laid. Three steamer piers have been built on the river-front, one of which is large enough to accommodate the biggest freighters on the lakes.

Such is the beginning of Marysville, builded with a deep, broad understanding of the human problems underlying all achievement. Labor representatives, capitalists and industrial leaders will watch its future with interest, for Mr. Wills's ambitious attempt to keep capital and labor in accord is unique and worthy of success.

For the unmarried workman, these community houses provide attractive quarters quite in contrast to those of the average rooming-house

The Ministry of Individuality

A Sermon by REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—I Cor. 9:1 and 15:7. "Have I not seen Jesus?" "He was seen of James, then of all the apostles."

ONE cannot read the Gospels and the Epistles without marking many distinctions. A great variety is manifest. But difference does not imply antagonism. You may have physiological differences with geological agreement. A great variety of scenery may be found on the same geological formation. You may have a quiet meadow, a wild, steep hill, a purple moorland and a yellow cornfield, all based on kindred rock. Superficial differences may exist with fundamental kinship.

It is thus with the apostolic writings. There are epistles, like the Epistles of John, which are so simple in thought and style as to be like a quiet meadow in which a child can play. There are other epistles, like the Epistle to the Romans, so lofty and difficult in thought as to be like precipitous heights which can be climbed only by skilful mountaineers. These differences in style and thought are increased by the differences in the aspect of the truths presented. While one emphasizes faith, another emphasizes love. These superficial differences may exist with fundamental agreement; many truths may all center in one truth; but the differences are sufficiently manifest to warrant each of the writers referring to his representation of the truth as his own.

These differences are evident in the evangelists. It may need special application and study to note the differences between Matthew and Mark, or Mark and Luke, but even a cursory and unskilled survey will reveal the difference between the Gospel by Matthew and the Gospel by John. You are in the same country but amid different scenery. We indicate a difference on the title-page. We preface the story of the evangelists with these words: "The Gospel according to Matthew," "The Gospel according to Mark," and so on.

Why intrude the personality of the man? Why not suppress Matthew altogether? Why should he be named? Why not just call it the Gospel of Jesus Christ? Well, it is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, but it is Jesus' Gospel as seen through the individuality of Matthew. It is Jesus Christ as Matthew saw Him. John's Gospel is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, but it is Jesus' Gospel as seen through the individuality of John. The individuality counts for something. It is an element which can not be ignored. It is the factor which to some extent shapes and colors the Gospel, which creates these differences, and which justifies each evangelist in describing his own presentation as his own, the Gospel as seen through his own individuality.

NOW let us look at that. Here is Christ the very truth of God, absolute truth, He lived the truth; He thought the truth; He spake the truth; He was the Truth. He was the Light of the World. The story of that Life of light and truth has to be transmitted to the ages. How can it be done? Here, round about our Lord, are a few men, a little disciple band. They shall receive the truth. Upon them shall the light of Jesus fall, and by them shall it be communicated to the generations of after-time. But the men are of varied types. They differ in genius, in temperament, in knowledge, in endowment. No two of them are alike. How will the truth of Jesus fare when it is transmitted through men of such diverse natures, through media of such different kinds?

Here is the pure white light, compounded of seven different colors. This pure white light streams down upon very varied substances. How fares the light? It is broken up. One substance allows every color in the light to pass by except green, and it reveals the green element in the light. Another allows every color to pass by except violet, and it reveals the violet element in the light. As the light falls upon different substances, the different substances reveal the different elements which compose the light.

Now here is the light and truth of Jesus streaming down upon differently constituted men, upon varied individualities. What happens? The light is broken up. From one man shines one color of the light, from another man shines another. The truth of Jesus is broken into different elements, and one element is prominent here, another there. Here are two men, Luke and John. They are of very different personality, of every differently constituted mental substance. The light and truth of Jesus falls upon these two men, and they have communicated it to us. Now mark the difference. Luke was a physician and an artist. Now, pass the light of Jesus through that individuality, and you have as a result the Gospel of Luke. It is the Gospel of the physician and the artist. It is full of healings, full of tenderesses, beauty, and grace. It is the Gospel of the prodigal son.

John was of quite another type. John was mystical, meditative, loving to deal with great secrets and remote origins. Pass the light of Jesus through such an individuality, and you have the Gospel of John. Just as Luke's is the Gospel of the painter, John's is the Gospel of the theologian. John has caught the great reasonings, and the mystic words of the Lord. If John mentions so tangible a thing as a miracle, it is only as the basis of some great discourse. He names the feeding of the five thousand, but it is only the text, mentioned that he may give us Christ's mysterious words on the Bread of Life. It is from him that we learn the mystery of the new birth, and the awful secret of the sacramental presence.

Here, then, we have two Gospels, the Gospel according to Luke, and the Gospel according to John, and in each we have the Gospel of Jesus as revealed through the individuality of a man.

NOW, there is a great principle rising out of all this, and it is this: the truth of Jesus does not suppress the individuality of men, but rather retains and

Or shall the light of Jesus shine from his endowment? Shall his gift be used by the Spirit?

There was one man in the days of the English Reformation whose wit and humor did far more for the cause of religion than many another man's pedantry and gloom—I mean Hugh Latimer. He was richly endowed with homely humor and with shrewd mother wit, and with these he linked the moral earnestness and fire of an old Jewish prophet. And everywhere God spoke through this man's gifts, through his wit and humor and earnestness, and such powerful preaching had rarely been known. His individuality, just as it was, he consecrated to his Lord. He would not compress himself into the orthodox mold.

I HAVE taken this extreme instance, because from this every other instance can be deduced. The truth, the love, the Gospel of Jesus can speak through men in different ways. It shines from your own individuality. It works through your own endowment and temperament. The Gospel will pass through our individuality and show itself as hope and joy and cheeriness. Others of us are more pronouncedly of the emotional temperament. The Gospel will reveal itself through us in comforts, and compassion. It will be one of balm and healing, most welcome to the broken in heart. For we are not all equally good at sympathizing. We have not all just got the balm that will stay the pain of a wounded spirit. We may be of the mental temperament, and the Gospel will reveal itself through us in wealthy thoughts, deep reasonings, new solutions of old questions.

And so we each have our Gospels, one revealing itself in joy and cheeriness, another in sympathy and healing, another in illumination and light. One is more fitted to go and comfort the sorrowing Martha and Mary; another is more fitted to go and help the doubting Thomas; another more fitted to bless little children. It is God's purpose that, from our own individuality, His Gospel shall speak to those about us, and while all our Gospels are essentially one, there are such differences in the manifestation as to justify us in making the superficial distinction described in our text, "the Gospel according to Matthew."

WHAT then does all this indicate? It indicates a necessity for tolerance; nay, for more than tolerance, for mutual forbearance, for generosity, for a gracious brotherliness, for a spirit of mutual expectancy and welcome. Where views and conceptions are many, we are apt to deny the reality and genuineness of all which differ from our own. That was not the apostolic way. Paul and James were very distinct in their individuality, and very distinct in their conception and presentation of the truth. But neither thought of denying to the other the accuracy of his vision. No one has received the whole truth. No one has tracked the whole circuit. "Now we know in part." A small portion of the great structure has been revealed to me; a small portion to you.

"Now we know in part." Oh, if we could remember that, how it would convert our denominational rivalry into mutual helpfulness. How it would turn these hostile camps into friendly and co-operative assemblies! The Light of the World is revealed through many media. The truth of Jesus works through varied institutions. These individualized Gospels together make the Gospel. There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. There are differences of administration, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all.

It remains for us to give ourselves to the Lord, with all our varied endowments. Let Jesus shine through us. Let us be ourselves, but ourselves sanctified! Let the Gospel we reveal enshrine the very heart of Christ; let us be filled with the spirit of the Cross, and then, amid all our differences, we shall be ministers of the same grace, the carriers of mercy and peace.

LAST year was the greatest year in the history of the Christian Church in the training of rural ministers, according to the Home Missions Council. A dozen schools to afford special training in up-to-date rural church methods were held by several denominations co-operatively, most of them at State Agricultural Colleges, although some were held at denominational schools. In addition to the co-operative schools several denominations conducted schools for their own men, the Methodist Episcopal Church, for instance, conducting sixteen of these schools with an attendance of over twelve hundred pastors. These training institutes lasted from ten days to three weeks, and the instructors numbered over three hundred, selected from the most successful pastors in the land.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus Shall Reign Where'er the Sun." or "Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Revelation 21:1-7.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (See page 259, first column.)

Sermon—"THE MINISTRY OF INDIVIDUALITY"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer!—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Rock of Ages," or "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Dismiss us not from Thy presence, we beseech Thee, O Thou great and loving One, as we separate from one another, but welcome us anew and with daily hospitality into the friendship which we crave of companionship with heavenly things, as we do our earthly tasks and sing songs that will be heard all the way from this world into the other. In Jesus' name we ask it. AMEN.

uses it. It would be possible for God to make all Christians as uniform as billiard balls, to suppress every special characteristic, and to refine away every peculiar angle, to smooth down every little rising of individuality, to extinguish variety in sameness. It would have been possible for God to have made Luke just like John, to have made them tell precisely the same story, to have made them reflect the same color of the truth. But that was not, nor has it ever been, the way of God. Men's individuality is retained, and through the individuality the truth reveals its colors.

Now, that is what God wishes to do with men today. He wants His truth to speak through our own individuality. He wants His light to be reflected from our own endowment. I am afraid this is very often forgotten, and especially among the young. It is often assumed that when men become religious, they are pressed and squeezed into a certain fixed uniform mould. There is a certain sombre, colorless piety, or rather perhaps pietism, which is too often taken as the type, and to suppress everything which is out of conformity with this type appears to many to be the purpose of the Christian life.

Now, that is not God's way. God does not desire to make all individualities alike. He desires to make your own individuality shine with the light of heaven. Take what is, perhaps, an extreme instance: Here is a man endowed with fresh, exuberant wit, overflowing with bright, sunny humor. He is the welcome center of every social circle. He can irradiate cheer into the most sedate. Well, the Holy Ghost lays hold of that man; he becomes a loyal and devoted follower of the Christ. What then? Shall his individuality be stamped out? Shall his wit and humor be quenched?

* Dr. Jowett's sermons, prepared especially for the Christian Herald, are published in the first issue of every month.

The Tares Among the Wheat

SUNDAY. Matt. 13:27. "Didst thou not sow good seed in thy field; whence then, hath it tares?" Yes, where do the tares come from? Who are the carriers, and who are the sowers of the unwelcome seed? I spend no end of time weeding my garden. I choose favorable seasons when the soil is soft and loose, and I pull up the weeds, "root and all, and all in all." I cleanse the soil. I burn it. I give it pure nourishment. I sow the best seed. But the weeds appear! "Where do they come from?" I ask the gardener. "Well," he says, "for one thing there is a neglected patch less than a mile away, and we are not far from the open country." And what I experience in my garden every farmer experiences in his fields. The ill seed is borne by every wind, and every bird is a minister in its distribution.

Who has not seen the tares? They even enter fortunate fields which have the most favored exposure. There are tares in the Church of Christ. The good Lord sows good seed, for he has no other, and yet the tares appear. We can see them growing in the Church at the earliest days. Cast your eyes over the Church in Corinth; what an awful sight for the farmer! Could anybody have imagined that such noxious, poisonous things could so speedily have invaded the field and taken possession. We can see the tares growing in the Church of the Middle Ages. We can see rank growths appearing in the Church of the Puritans. And we should be stone-blind if we did not see them in the Church of our own day. The tares are fearfully mixed up with the wheat, and the wheat is often strangled and smothered in the wild confusion. "Didst not thou sow good seed in thy field; whence then hath it tares?"

And who has not seen the tares appear in the fair field of beneficence and philanthropy? Some man makes a bequest for clean and honorable issues. Perhaps it is a considerable provision for the poor. And the wheat is very sweet and lovely. But the weeds appear. Sectarian prejudices get into the hospitality and all sorts of bitter bigotries are mixed with its ministries. The good man sowed good seed; whence then hath it tares? Or it may be that some one thinks of the field of education, and determines to enrich it with his beneficence. He will open wide doors of opportunity for every student. He will make it easier for every one to make his way. What a field of fine wheat! But tares appear—lethargy, enervation, indolence, ease. Yes, indeed, fat tares flourish in the field of beneficence.

And who has not seen the tares in other fields of the soul's inheritance? Perhaps some finer freedom has been sown by noble hands, some splendid franchise, some quick and quickening emancipation. It was fine, clean wheat, and yet the blade had scarcely appeared before the tares appeared also. Every extension of noble liberty has been accompanied by some form of license—darnels which look very much like honest wheat. Freedom of speech is attended by irresponsibility, by blasphemy, by gossip, and scandal. Good seed was sown in the field; whence then hath it tares?

And who has not seen the tares in the fields of literature and art? Clean, sweet, strong, seed is sown in the fields, but the tares are flung into the soil and grow up with the wheat. Some books are pure and healthy as the angels which "excel in strength," and there are books with sensual setting and inclination. There are books which are vital and vitalizing, and there are books which are decadent and deadly. It is a rare field, and good seed was sown in it! whence then hath it tares?

And what about the fields of recreation? What fine, healthy, attractive things can be seen in the realm of sport! What clean vigor, what masculine emulation! But the tares appear with the wheat. Gambling is in every field, and in many a field there is jealousy, and foul play, and strife and ill-contention. Aye, tares get among the wheat. What then? Let us scatter God's seed with prodigal hands. Let us sow it everywhere. Let us be keen and alert in our sowing. Let us be the first in every field. Let us sow it in private and in public. As far as lies in us, let us give the devil no advantage. Let us watch and pray, and let us be busy in our fields with an unflinching determination, that in the day of the harvest home, the Lord shall have a heavy reaping. J. H. J.

"As a Little Child"

MONDAY. John 7:17 (also v. 37). "If any man—" The master does not know any favorites. He is not a respecter of persons. To men that are black of skin, His word is the same as for those that are white, brown or yellow. He does not look on the outward appearance. He does not pay any attention to racial differences. A man may be ignorant or he may be learned, there is one and the same rule in either case: "Except he become as a little child, he cannot enter." Jesus Christ does not issue special dispensations for the benefit of the few. When they asked Him how many would be saved, He made it clear that He was not closing the door in anybody's face; all should have a chance—all were encouraged to make the effort. When certain disciples began to discuss special privileges that might belong to them, He quickly pointed out that there were no spoils of office at His disposal.

It is true we sometimes speak of the inner circle of Jesus' friends, for example, the three that were present at the Transfiguration. But we are not to suppose that these were arbitrarily selected for such favors. They and they only fulfilled the conditions. Peter and James and John climbed the hill; the others were contented to stay on lower ground, forfeiting the companionship of Jesus in His hour of glorification. Is it not likely that the twelve were invited and only the three responded? "The many are called," even though "The few are chosen."

"Any man" can enjoy the friendship of Christ according to the measure of his highest aspiration. Behold, He stands at every door and knocks!

Following the Fashions

TUESDAY. I Cor. 7:31. "The fashion of this world passeth away." Dr. Tapy in his great lecture on the "Psychology of Fashion," says: "Fashion is a series of recurrent changes and has for its basis not betterment, but change." He also goes on to say that the factors in fashion are: 1. The men who make new fashions to sell goods, and 2—The people who demand new fashions to be different, and to attract attention. Dress and clothing, he says, are not synonymous terms.

It is bad taste to dress so as to be conspicuous, whether in the height of fashion or not. What we should object to is the slavery of fashion; the waste of good material, the extravagance and pride and heart-burnings because of fashion. Paul was not thinking of dress particularly. He was rather showing the transitory character of things material contrasted with spiritual things. But his words, nevertheless, may be applied to dress and customs and ideas. The fashions of this world—yes, of this month—pass away. Fashion is a moving picture, a passing parade, a condition of flux, a stage of shifting scenes. If a man walked up Broadway dressed as Julius Cæsar dressed he would probably be arrested. If he talked as Shakespeare talked he would be thought crazy.

The "fashion of this world passeth away," but Paul was stating a great truth in a negative way. The fashion of the unseen world does not pass away. The Divine mind does not wait to arrive. The pansy and buttercup will wear the same dress next spring; the first robin the same plumage. The sun will rise and set, the stars cover the same courses, the ocean ebb and flow in a manner familiar to Abraham. Truth does not pass away. Goodness cannot change. Love can not fail. It is Christ still for the world's need; for sin and salvation have not passed away.

The Evil Stings That Assail

WEDNESDAY. Acts 28:3. "There came a viper out of the heap and fastened on his hand." The Apostle was seeking to do good when he put the sticks on the fire. Evil stings us often when we are in the Master's work. An unexpected bite attacks our moral nature. What seems innocent may become an evil habit, dragging us down to ruin. The strongest temptations are those of the flesh. The viper fastened upon his hand. That which is most pleasing to the taste, the appetite, may be the most deadly, poisoning the whole body. Christ has promised to make a way for our escape. His blood cleanseth away the poison, healing the soul. He would not have you retire from the activities of the battle of life, hidden away in a glass case of seclusion where no temptation could reach you. He says, "Follow Me! deny self, work in My vineyard and you will receive your everlasting reward." Be not afraid to meet the enemy of your soul; shake off the temptations as Paul did the viper. If you play with serpents, you will be stung; if you compromise your principles, apologizing for evil, you are in great danger. You must shake off the evil thing, or it will be your ruin.

How soon the public changes its mind about a man who at first seemed an escaped convict. At last, bitten by a viper, the people thought he was receiving his just deserts; but when he shakes the vile thing off and goes about uninjured, he is considered a hero, a god, a victor. There is only one right side to every great moral question. If we stand for the truth before the world, we will save ourselves and aid mankind.

Fruit of the Spirit

THURSDAY. Gal. 5:22. "The fruit of the Spirit." The fruit of the Christian life is the same as the fruit of the Spirit, because the Spirit is to produce the fruit in the life of the Christian. It will not do for a Christian to profess all kinds of Christian virtues and possess none. One can not be a real Christian twenty or thirty years, and not have something to show for in the fruit of the Spirit.

One of the great purposes of the Church is to provide the best conditions for the development of the fruit of the Spirit in the lives of Christian men and women. To be a Christian is more than being saved. It means also to be Christlike. It is to produce in our lives the character that Jesus produced in His. There is more to a Christian life than simply beginning it—just as there is more to a garden than simply planting it—things are to be cultivated in order that fruit may be produced. The best Christian generally produces the best fruit and the most of it.

The fruit of the Spirit is really vital religion, which expresses itself in love, joy, peace.

Saved by Hope

FRIDAY. Rom. 8:24. "For we are saved by hope." Most of us are familiar with George Frederick Watts' picture of Hope. It is beautiful and touching. A female figure, seated with drooping head-bands over a broken harp that holds but a single string. She will make music—she will sing, even though but one unbroken string remains. Let us not deny that this is a good symbol of human hope in hours when the fires of life burn low, but it is not the hope that saves in the large sense in which Paul spoke. It is not Christian hope.

The hope which not only saves from despair, but lifts to heights of certainty and exultation must be represented by a different symbol. Two works of art, both very familiar, neither of which bears the name of Hope, give us better symbols than the "Hope" of the great English painter. One of them is the "Winged Victory" of antique classic sculpture, and the other is the "Victory" of St. Gaudens in the Sherman monument at the entrance to Central Park, New York. Both figures are erect, buoyant, vital. The head of the "Winged Victory" is lacking, but fancy supplies it, and it is an onward-looking face, a countenance elate with confidence.

Look for this type of hope in the long ages before Christ came. Who had it? Abraham, Moses, David. It is none other than the Messianic hope, the confident expectation that One shall come to vindicate the honor of God and to redeem the souls of His servants. Perhaps the Messianic hope at its best is seen in another.

A sore-stricken and lonely man cries out, in the hour of his greatest anguish, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and, though this body be destroyed, yet shall I see God." Does he expect to take this body into the spirit world? No, no, but in the flesh God shall yet be seen. We are face to face with the Incarnation, more than a thousand years before Christ. We must draw a line straight from Job, that shall span the years before He comes of whom John says, "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." C. C. A.

The Shield of Faith

SATURDAY. Eph. 6:16. "Above all . . . the Shield of Faith." The shield is the most important piece of the armor. Every piece is necessary, and every piece good. No matter how good these others are, if the shield be lacking or defective, the soldier is not fully protected.

Note the different parts to the Christian's armor. There is the breastplate of righteousness; for the feet, the preparation of the Gospel of peace; for a helmet the hope of salvation; and for a sword, the Word of God. But "above all" there is the shield of faith.

Now, this expression, "above all," is not an accident. I believe it was as carefully thought out and used in this case as any other part of the passage. While these other parts of the armor are to serve as protection to the soldier, the shield of faith is to protect his armor. That is to say, suppose you are wearing the breastplate of righteousness and lacking in faith; suppose you have the helmet and the sword of the Spirit, and all these other splendid things, and lack faith in the outcome? What are your chances of winning out? Nil! But on the other hand, if you are wearing the "whole armor of God," plus faith in the fight, there is no enemy or combination of enemies that can bring you down.

"As your FAITH is so will it be done unto you."

Reaching Toward the Sun

WE New Yorkers seldom have gardens—unless we have a great deal of money. For it takes a great deal of money, in this crowded city, to own even the tiniest bit of a grass plot. But we love gardens, most of us, and that is why we like to imagine that we have plenty of free, open space for sun dials and hollyhocks and rose bushes and pansy beds—why we like to imagine wonderful things, and why we end by having a wee box of geraniums or a pot of jonquils on our widest window-sill.

My garden this spring was a very simple one. It was also small—as small, almost, as a garden can be. But it was exceedingly beautiful, for all that it was so small and so simple. I made it by planting a succession of white narcissus bulbs in low porcelain bowls; bulbs so brown and shriveled on the outside that it seemed hardly within the bounds of reason to believe that they bore, inside, a wealth of grace and perfume.

I planted the narcissus bulbs in smooth white pebbles, and moistened them daily with fresh water. And then, to let the roots have a chance at getting strong and healthy, I set the low bowls in a dark place and left them there for nearly a week. And when the week was over I took them out of the dark place, which was a closet, and set them in the sunlight upon my widest window-sill.

The roots had taken hold during that dark week. As I wiggled an experimental finger through the loose white pebbles I could feel the strong tug of them. But the small green shoots that had grown out of the shriveled brownness of the bulbs were slender, fragile things with nothing vivid in their coloring. They looked almost transparent, almost anemic, when I first placed them in the sunlight.

NARCISSUS bulbs grow quickly. In almost three weeks from the time of planting, they bear flowers. They grow with such miraculous speed that it is an adventure to watch their daily progress. Every hour, it seems, they have gone onward and upward. And, from the time that they have their introduction to the sun, the color of their leaves becomes more vital, more alive.

I watched over my narcissus bulbs with a joy that folk, who have many flowers, might not understand. I took a personal pride in every shoot; in every gallant bud. Only one thing troubled me about my garden, and that was the fact that my garden would not grow straight up! Every narcissus plant insisted upon curving out over my window-sill, toward the place that the sunlight came from. Every leaf, every bud, and later every blossom pointed first toward the street and then toward the sky.

"They look almost curly," I mourned, surveying them. "Why don't they stand up, stiff and tall, like soldiers? Each shoot has two distinct bends in it."

The man-who-knows-more-about-flowers-than-I-do (doesn't that sound like a long Indian name?) answered me.

"Of course they have two distinct bends in them," he told me in a mildly reproving tone, "they're doing the only natural thing that they could do. If they grew up stiff and straight, as you want them to, they'd be going against all the fixed rules!" I will always ask a question. "Just why would they be going against the fixed rules?" I asked. "Just why?" The man—I won't add the rest of the long, Indian-sounding title—answered from the height of his superior knowledge.

A Lesson to Be Learned from a Bowl of Narcissus

"You thought," he told me, "when you put the bowls upon the window-sill, that they would have all of the sunlight that they needed. You didn't realize that the window-sill above threw a partial shade upon our window-sill. You didn't realize—but the flowers did! They knew, instinctively, that there was more sunlight to be had if they leaned a little farther out. And so they grew that way. Flowers will always grow toward the sun because they know that they need the sun. They're unlike human beings who grow away from the things that are good for them—t h a t they need!"

To a Bowl of Lilies

(In a Japanese Gift Shop)

BEFORE a bronze-browed Buddha, silent,
And patiently you stand—your white cups glow
With beauty that the Buddha cannot see,
With beauty that the Buddha cannot know!
The incense-laden air seems always striving,
To thrust aside the gallant leaves you raise,
But, through the heavy dusk your gold hearts, thriving,
Sing to One God, a hymn of trust and praise.

The Buddha smiles above your wordless story—
The Buddha's smile is bland, above your song!
He can not know the Power and the Glory . . .
His rule has been so placid, and so long,
He does not know that you, who fade tonight,
Stand for the Resurrection and the Light!

Not on purpose, often—not often to be contrary or foolish or obstinate. They grow away from the things they need—the things that will make them better—because they have never learned to reach instinctively, as the flowers reach, toward the Light. They grope along in the shadows, missing the purpose and the glory of things. They are sometimes afraid of bending their backs, sometimes afraid of growing out of place—as my narcissus plants grew. Human beings, sometimes, seem unable to understand the laws of life—as the flowers understand them.

When my flowers were getting their start—growing their firm roots—I put them in a dark, closet place. And there, away from the light, they gained their initial strength, but became pale, unpleasant, undernourished plants. If I had left them in the closet any longer they would have died for want of light.

But I did not leave them in the dark. I took them hurried, gladly, out of the shadows and placed them on my widest window-sill. And the sunlight fell upon them like a caress and a prayer. And they, mad with the delight of it, leaned out across the sill; out so far that their stalks were curiously bent. And by leaning out they were able to gain more light, brighter light.

I took great joy in my flowers. And I learned a lesson from them, too. For I could not help comparing them with souls who are brought up in the shadows and who, finally, experience the love of God. As I saw their color brighten, as I saw them become more glorious and vivid, I remembered certain folk who had brightened and become more vivid because of the Light of His love. And as I watched the way that they grew, reaching always toward the sun, I could not help thinking of the ardent Christians that I know, who seem never to have enough of God's brightness—who are always reaching out for more.

Reaching toward the sun—reaching toward the light—is the natural thing to do. Perhaps it's necessary, sometimes, to stay for a short while in the dark—but only for a short while. When you've been brought out of the shadows keep away from them. Reach as persistently, and as bravely, as did the narcissus flowers!

The Greatest Living Authors Are Now Working With Paramount

PROGRESS has two phases for Paramount Pictures: one is to surpass competition: that means effort, but not difficulty.
The other phase is to surpass ourselves; to surpass our own achievements. And this is a more exacting task.

That is why Paramount has assembled, and maintains, such perfection and completeness of personnel and mechanical equipment in its immense studios in Los Angeles, Long Island City and London.

But all this stupendous equipment of organized resource, of actors, actresses, directors and their knowledge and art, and science—all these things are not enough to make one single Paramount Picture.

For Shakespeare was right when he said, "The Play's the Thing."

And a play is not a mere physical chattel. A play must be an utterance: it must be sentiment and emotion: hope and fear: good and evil: love and hate: laughter and tears.

Since the beginning of the human race, some men and women have been given the great power of creation and depiction:
the power of showing us ourselves and our neighbors: not simply in the flesh but more intimately, more truly, in the spirit.

It is by the genius of these people that plays are created.
Many of these people you know:
for even in spite of the cold limitations of the printed page, they are famous: through the unpicturesque medium of printers' ink they have already stirred your emotions, evoked your wonder, inspired your admiration.

Sir James M. Barrie you know; and Joseph Conrad, and Arnold Bennett,
Robert Hichens, E. Phillips Oppenheim,
Sir Gilbert Parker, Edward Knoblock,
W. Somerset Maugham, Thompson
Buchanan, Avery Hopwood, Henry
Arthur Jones, Cosmo Hamilton, Edward Sheldon, Samuel Merwin, Harvey J.
O'Higgins and Geo. Pattullo.

All these famous authors are actually in the studios writing new plays for Paramount Pictures, advising with directors, using the motion picture camera as they formerly used the pen. They have every one of them realized the infinitely greater scope for expression offered to their genius by the medium of modern motion pictures when re-enforced by the stupendous producing and distributing resources of the Paramount organization.

Paramount has first call, too, on the greatest American stories in the greatest American magazines when the stories are suitable for the films.

Every form of printed or spoken drama that might be suitable for Paramount Pictures is examined. Everything useful published in Italian, Spanish, German or French is steadily translated. Synopses are made of every stage play produced in America, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, London and Rome.

The interest and importance that these facts hold for you is this: A still greater "Paramount." A still higher level of artistic achievement.

The word "Paramount" already says more to you than any other word or phrase in motion pictures. Henceforth it means still more. It stands for something yet greater. It means that in the future, as in the past, as you approach your theatre and see the legend "A Paramount Picture," you will, as always,
"Know before you go" that you will see the best show in town.

America's Gifts for China

SURVEYS in China necessarily are more or less inaccurate, but with the progress of relief work there has come agreement on the big facts of famine conditions.

In November reports showed 15,000,000 people in the five northern provinces of Shantung, Chihli, Shensi, Shansi, and Honan suffering from lack of food and proper housing facilities. The comparatively mild winter has tended to alleviate the suffering to some extent and to hold down the mortality rate; and with the arrival of relief supplies, the improvement in transportation, and the redistribution of food reserves in the affected provinces, the number of those in most imperative need of assistance has rapidly decreased.

Surveys completed in February showed that there were still 10,000,000 people destitute and dependent upon outside assistance if they were to survive until next harvest. Advice early in March showed that at that time the work of relief had progressed so satisfactorily that the safety of all but 6,000,000 had been assured. Feeding and caring for at least 6,000,000 starving men, women and children until June, is, then, the task ahead of the generous-hearted United States.

Reviewing the work of the American Committee for China Famine Fund, since its appointment by President Wilson on December 9, 1920, a report thus summarizes the progress:

"Since its appointment, the American Committee has transmitted to China the sum of $2,200,000 (to March 5). Some religious bodies having special interests in China have sent direct to their representatives a sum in excess of $750,000.

"Our relief in the famine area is being distributed in three principal ways:

A. By direct gifts of food from kitchens established in missions, temples,

What the National Committee Has Accomplished for the Starving schools, churches, etc.

"B. By the establishment of hair net factories where women and girls are brought in, maintained for a period while they learn the trade of net making, and then replaced by untrained persons. One month of this form of relief usually suffices to make a girl or woman self-dependent in that she can earn enough money to buy her daily grain.

"C. By the establishment of phonetic schools for children under twelve who are without food or who have been left with no family. These schools are accomplishing a double purpose in saving life and reducing China's illiteracy. "The actual relief work is in the hands almost entirely of missionaries and employees of foreign business houses who have been released from their regular employment for relief work. They are assisted by dependable natives.

"While there have existed grave fears of a devastating typhus epidemic in the famine districts early precautions seem to have checked the disease. We now have five anti-typhus units at work; each consisting of one foreign and two Chinese physicians, six nurses, and ten coolies. They are engaged in an educational and delousing campaign and can be expanded to fifty units."

quite sure of that. Ameliamma reasoned within her dizzy little head that it was all because of the gold piece which had once clung to Madam and was now miles and miles away from her.

AMELIAMMA disposed of her wash and waterpot, then dropped upon the ground just outside the hut. Slowly there crept over her a consuming desire to see the fragile little white woman who had gone to the hills. It would have been difficult to follow the working of the Indian girl's brain, in which there was the merest trace of contrition for her own sin, theft being a native instinct which was largely indulged. But she felt a great pity for Madam because she was being left unguarded by the Fates, reduced in Ameliamma's mind to the proportions of a tiny gold cross. Something Ameliamma could not resist seemed to call to her from the hills.

The sun was high when Ameliamma left the village and took the crooked, narrow strip of a road over the plain. Steadily she pushed her way on until her feet burned and her lips were parched. After sundown she found shelter under a spreading mango tree near the highway, ate a few pieces of black bread and curled up in a dreary, achey little bundle for the night.

At sunrise she started on again, and the second day had all the hardship and tragedy of the first, together with a greater weariness and a sterner realization of her boldness in leaving the village without the permission of Kodiak, who would be angered and call down upon her the wrath of some god. Yet she stumbled on over the unfamiliar way, plunging into a thicket or scrambling behind a rock at the approach of any chance traveler. Once she lost her way and in the confusion of that set-back, she slid over ragged, steep places and climbed over rocks until her flesh and nails were torn. But at last Ameliamma reached the compound on the edge of a bubbling stream, where tree ferns, hydrangeas and calla lilies in abundance made a cooling haven.

MADAM, propped up in an easy chair on the porch of the bungalow, was suffering from a fractured ankle; and as she looked out over the hills and to the valley below, a loneliness and sense of failure crept over her. She had given so freely, sacrificed so much for India, and yet how little, how very little, India cared. Her heart was heavy and the unbidden tears sprang to her eyes. Then, a hollow-eyed, bleeding, blistered Hindu girl appeared before her—"Ameliamma!"

Brokenly the native poured out her story, and as she put the glistening bit of gold in Madam's hand: a glorified smile, spread over the English woman's face.

Ameliamma bathed, the cuts and bruises were anointed with healing balm, and food was set before her. Madam longed to shelter Ameliamma for a prolonged stay and would have urged her to remain at the camp, but the missionary knew that she could not justly persuade the girl for he hardships the Hindu wife had under one on the journey were nothing to the price she would have to pay upon her return to the village, for a Hindu woman could not leave her husband as Ameliamma had done without incurring a terrible penalty. The missionary would have saved her if possible, but over these things she had no control.

So Ameliamma went back, back over the same winding path with its ragged rocks and blistering sands, with a constantly increasing fear of Kodiak's revenge weighting her heart.

IT WAS evening when Ameliamma neared the settlement, and just before she reached the first little thatched hut she could see a thread of a blaze; it died down, then spurted up again. How well she knew what that fire meant. Some one, probably a cartman who had passed her on the way back, had told of her return and Kodiak was getting ready for her; he had gathered together a number of the neighbors and kin, to view the torture he would administer to his wayward wife. They would stand around with fiendish pleasure spread over their faces as Kodiak took embers from the fire and seared the evil spirits from his refractory wife.

Ameliamma crept nearer until she could see through the scraggly underbrush much that was going on in preparation for the festivity. A dozen men and boys were spreading themselves at as many angles about the fire; some, sluggish from the heat, stretched themselves apart from the others and bent their chins to their chests in sonorous slumber; others were boisterous and swapped stories of cruelty.

Ameliamma stared upon the scene, gnawing her lips with white teeth and digging her fingers hard into the palms of clammy hands. Then crouching on the ground, she looked up to the stars and folded her arms over her little brown breast in the form of a cross.

All of the men had dropped into a doze, when Kodiak fed the fire, and then went back into the darkness to throw himself on the ground for rest.

Slowly from the shadows a wriggling, slimy coil drew its length nearer and nearer until it closed in upon its prey. There were few really deadly serpents in the valley, but the greediest of the blackest lair had gone forth that night.

A cry of pain rent the air: "A cobra! A cobra!" groaned the stricken Kodiak, who had been bitten on the arm.

Ameliamma could see the dim outline of native figures, as the men sprang to their feet, and stood irresolutely about their companion. All knew full well the deadly poison of the serpent; all knew the homely native remedies, but there were none in the group who valued Kodiak's life enough to incur any danger to themselves or to rise above their caste superstition.

For one brief instant Ameliamma exalted; a skeleton of a smile spread over her face, her eyes glistened as a bit of the old retaliative spirit stole over her. Kodiak was getting the worst of this, too. Then suddenly, the mood changed; a tenderness strange and like a transfusion from another being stirred every nerve. With a bound she broke through the bushes and was at Kodiak's side. Bending over the agonized man, Ameliamma put her own parched lips to the wound, in an attempt to draw out the poison. She tore a strip of cloth from the sash about her waist, and tied it above the wound; then softly, in her purring Telugu tongue she whispered: "Poor Kodiak, Ameliamma is sorry for you, and will not laugh at you."

Yet in spite of Ameliamma's efforts to ward off the ensuing paralysis of the snake's bite, Kodiak was fast succumbing to its venom.

Tears blinded the usually stoical Hindu wife. Again she looked up to the sky, and through those tears the stars looked like so many tiny gold crosses. Quickly she bent to Kodiak's ear: "Look, Kodiak, my husband, there is a lucky piece for everyone, and one for you."

IT WAS spring, toward the end of the valley's most balmy season, and everything in nature was gorgeous. The tiny bell on the mission chapel was swinging out its sweetest tones, for it was Easter. Ameliamma was hurrying along the path toward the chapel, where she took her place with the native "Bible women," who like herself were clad in white cotton gowns, which had the appearance of a straight strip of cloth simply wound about their bodies.

A new missionary talked to the people gathered in the chapel. As he finished, Madam seated herself at the small portable organ; then from the group of brown faces before her she found Ameliamma's, and seemed to read her Easter message there. Gazing into the sparkling depths of Ameliamma's eyes, the missionary sang very softly but clearly in Telugu:

"Just to pity, just to love;
That's the story from above.
Just to help, just to smile,
Is the only thing worth while,
And the message of the Cross to you,
And the message of the Cross to you."

1200% profit from this man's garden

He was a "tired" business man. The garden measured 20 x 25 feet. From a $1.15 worth of pure-bred seeds he got $14.50 worth of vegetables incomparably superior in freshness, flavor and tenderness to the tough, stringy kind his wife used to buy at exorbitant prices.

Where else can you make 1200% profit—with extra dividends in good health? And it does make a man poke out his chest when he does a little extra to keep old H. C. L. off its lofty perch.

"Pure-bred seeds" means Ferry's seeds, of course—the kind that professional and amateur gardeners have preferred for sixty years. Ferry's pure-bred Seeds come from seed families which for many generations have produced vegetables of fine flavor and tenderness or flowers of supreme color, vigor and size.

The parent plants are selected from acres of plants and judged by rigid standards. Their progeny are tested for vitality, compared point by point with their parents' good qualities. Those that pass the tests are sold as Ferry's pure-bred Seeds—at 10c per paper.

Bible Teachings About Health

International Sunday-School Lesson for April 10

I Cor. 6: 19, 20; 9: 24-27; Gal. 6: 7, 8

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

CHRISTIANITY is with reference to the whole man and is vitally related to every phase of his life as well as to every person or thing with which he comes into contact. The body affects the soul, the material may even dominate the spiritual and the Holy Spirit in giving the Word of God furnishes instructions for this many sided man. The most practical book on the science of health is the Holy Bible.

Since the lessons for this quarter are taken from no less than fifteen books of the Bible there is a splendid opportunity for special general study. Read the entire book from which a passage is chosen. If you have not already memorized the books in their order learn the names of the thirty-nine books on that upper shelf and the twenty-seven on the lower shelf of the world's greatest library. A teacher should insist that all young people do this, and of course the teacher will set the example. Know the authors of the New Testament—eight of them—Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, Peter, James and Jude. Of course you have some plan for Bible reading that you are following daily.

Paul suggests three unusually helpful passages for this week. He indicates the honor placed upon the human body in that it is indwelt by the Holy Spirit. In becoming Christ's all that we have and are belong to him. The body, with its wonderful possibilities for good or evil belong to God. Local surroundings affect our thinking and Paul, though in Ephesus, writes to the Corinthians about those wonderful Isthmian games. He tells them that he trains for a more worth-while race and no cost will be too great that he, yes and any one else, may win the prize. A wreath of olive is not to be compared to the reward that God will give. He knows that daily deeds count forever and that God's law grinds steadily both in the material and spiritual kingdom—"whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

HEALTH of the individual is clearly presented in the portion of scripture especially suggested for study by the children in connection with this lesson, Daniel 1: 8-21. Those Hebrew children ate what would nourish the body without harming it and at the end of ten days the contrast was very apparent. This is the quarterly temperance lesson and "temperance" has a broader application than merely alcoholic liquor. One can sin by over-eating or by eating that food which does not enable the body to perform its high calling in co-operation with the spirit. Wrong personal habits show themselves very clearly in the faces of the youth just as the rich food marked the countenances of those Babylonian princes. During the war the young men of this country were examined impartially by the physicians and the number rejected for physical causes was simply appalling. Paul gave his rule of life as "I buffet my body, and bring it into bondage." He purposed not to be rejected. In youth one should lay up a stock of health for the future rather than mortgage that future by excesses of any kind.

The licensed saloon is gone forever in this land. The use of alcohol as a beverage is unscientific and too much credit for placing this information before the American people cannot be given to the W. C. T. U. They saw to it, by the help of some men, that the children of the land should know the effect of alcohol on the human body. The lengthening of life without alcohol more than makes up for even the awful loss of life during the war. Other nations will soon go dry, for the wet nation cannot compete commercially with dry America.

The Churches as well as the State have now a great cooperative work in making clear to the suicidal addicts who insist on "personal liberty" that they are shortening their live and robbing the state of a real asset. Those who continue to defy the law may be induced to see that they are un-American. Only a couple of years ago one who was found to be un-American discovered that it was good for his health to move to another country. Sowing lawlessness means reaping crime, and a pretty large harvest is being gathered right now.

Many churches and Sunday-schools can get a very practical application from this lesson by looking into the matter of ventilation of their buildings. Often there is none and that is bad. Again there is too much and people catch cold. Somebody should be responsible to see that the temperature and amount of fresh air are always just right. Good health will be the result. Whoever opens the windows should make certain before entering the building from which direction the wind blows and then open the windows on the opposite side of the room. This will give good air and avoid drafts. Here is an opportunity for Sunday-schools to exemplify the teaching in the title for the day. Restlessness on the part of pupils is often due to lack of good fresh air. Many preachers see people asleep in their audience when the real fault is with the janitor or head usher. The result is that the minister is trying to beat the air and the air often wins.

THE church has a responsibility with reference to the public health. There have been enough surveys lately to furnish work for all. Statistics show that much sickness is preventable and give their figures: 70 per cent. tuberculosis, 30 per cent. blindness, 80 per cent. typhoid, and 40 per cent. pneumonia. Daily Vacation Bible Schools are working wonders in the matter of the health of the children who attend, as well as improving their minds and morals. Sunday-schools on the foreign mission fields are giving much attention to the physical life of those who attend. Many children in non-Christian lands do not know how to play and the Sunday-school is directing the play life. Some people tell about the wonderful results that could be accomplished if their church only had a gymnasium and how they could then do broad social service work. If there is no gymnasium at hand much helpful exercise can be obtained by running errands of mercy and the old fashioned wood pile still is a good home trainer. The lad said he loved his mother with both arms full, as he carried in the wood which filled the box and added to his health by so doing.

Medical missions, whether at home or abroad are outstanding illustrations and applications of "Bible Teachings About Health." Severance Hospital in Seoul, Korea, is one of the increasingly many places which can be styled "Heaven on earth." As the body is mended, souls learn to know of the Great physician.

The famine relief work in China today is opening doors of hearts to the truths about the Bread of Life. The point of a lancet opened a whole nation to the incoming of the gospel message. Such work is a seed which brings forth more fold than can ever be computed here. It costs enough to challenge the most heroic to give himself. Right now the missionaries in North China are asking, though not in fear, "Who will lay down their lives this time in administering relief to the hungry and diseased?" In the work of each previous famine relief some have died.

Keeping fit is as important as becoming fit. The Christian athlete is always spiritual strong and ready for any task or opportunity. As he follows with his Lord he never breaks training. He then can say at the last with Paul, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith."

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE Young Men's Bible Class Federation, of Key West, Fla., has entered on a "Campaign to have all the laws enforced which are being broken." A member writes: "We realize that we have got a big task ahead of us; but we are trusting to God to help us win the battle. Our present plan for the year is: the third Thursday in each month we will have a fast all day and meet at one of the churches and invoke Almighty God to help bring about better conditions in Key West. Also we have faith that this movement will result in a revival such as never has been in our city. We request that your Prayer League help us in this battle, by asking Almighty God to give us Divine guidance in the movement that we may be successful, and that Key West may be shaken by the Power of God, and men and women may repent and accept Christ as their Saviour."

J. D. Scarborough, Wages Route, Colo., writes: "Please help us pray that we may get located just where God can get the most glory out of our services, and where we can do the most good for His cause and Kingdom. Also, that one who is suffering from tumor may be healed and understand how to fully consecrate his services to God."

Reader, Chino, Calif., asks prayer for a family in Africa who have returned to heathenism because of the death of their child. "Pray that they may be brought back to God and many souls saved."

W. I. Newman, a young man preparing for the ministry, writes that he is passing through a period of bitter trial and temptation. He adds: "I request prayer that I may be given grace to withstand trial, and overcome temptation, and be carried through to my work for Christ."

L. E. M. asks prayer for a sister who is dying, and "that she may be delivered from a false teaching and may know the reality of a Divine Saviour and the blood that cleanseth."

M. E. D. asks prayer for a woman now in St. Luke's Hospital, who has been there eight months. She writes: "She is from a country town, no friends here, and with no religion. Pray for her, that her heart and her eyes may be opened to a loving Saviour."

D. M. R. requests prayer for a great "outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the inhabitants of Calgary, Canada, that many of the eighty thousand may be saved and delivered from Satan's power."

W. A. G. asks prayers for a mighty revival of the pure and undefiled religion of Jesus Christ upon the Church and community at Conklin Center, N. Y.; C. W. B. asks prayers for a revival of religion and the salvation of souls at Sterling, Ohio; and M. R. writes: "We are praying for an old-fashioned Holy Ghost revival here in Oskaloosa, Kans., and have many unsaved souls on our hearts."

Mrs. D. G. S. sends in a request in behalf of Hartington, Nebr., and Mrs. F. W. B., asks prayers for a revival in Braddock, Pa.

A. H. B., writes: "We are in the midst of a revival in Minburn, Iowa. Our pastor gives us good Gospel sermons, but the people are so indifferent! Pray that we may have the greatest revival that Minburn has ever had and that many may be brought to Christ."

"We are planning to have a series of revival meetings here at Sylacauga, Ala., beginning April 13th," writes Miss S. T. "Pray for us that the church may be greatly revived and many souls saved."

Among the general requests we have received the following: for healing, 250; conversion of relatives and friends, 230; peace, 25; spiritual advancement, 32; wisdom, 40; relief from pain, 5; reconciliation, 29; faith, 38; blessing, 52; forgiveness, 8; courage, 7; financial aid, 46; guidance, 35; success, 15; requests known only to God, 25.

We have received acknowledgments of answered prayer from the following members: Miss T. M. M., Mrs. S., Mrs. C. W. D., Mrs. C. M. S., Mrs. C. J., W. B. R., E. N., Mrs. N. B. P., A Sister and "Portland, Me."

How Does Christ Wish His Day to Be Spent?

E. L., C. E., and B. Y. P. U., Matt. 12: 1-13

STUDY the reference and you will learn how the Master employed a part of one Sunday. We deduce from this that it is permissible to make Sunday a holy day indeed by an errand of mercy, a visit to the sick and shut-in, these in every community who are in some special need of Christian ministry. Aside from the morning and evening worship there is a form of worship that is so easily forgotten. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Sunday is a great day for Good Samaritan ministry. There are no special seasons for the word of cheer and the helping hand.

Newell Dwight Hillis suggests that Sunday ought to be used as a "Library Day" for the culture of reason, conscience and duty. Anything which helps to preserve the Sabbath in the interest of conscience and duty would merit the approval of Jesus. It is certain that he would not indorse the rigid rule that forbids any kind of action on the day. Sitting in supine idleness and indolent inaction dishonors any day. Lord Macaulay was not pleading the cause of religionists, but stating the case of brotherhood when he said that "we are not impoverished but enriched by this seventh day." Enrichment therefore comes from attending the Church, the Library, the Sick Room, making it a day of "rest and gladness," fellowship and brotherhood, worship and duty, inspiration and profit for the spiritual life, of self and others. It is a day for the outgoing as well as the deepening of the soul-life.

If we have bodies, we are souls. And if it takes six-sevenths of the week to provide and prepare bread to meet our bodily hunger, we must be sure to use the seventh part of the week to remind ourselves how many hungers there are which cannot be met by bread only. This is a matter for the individual to decide, with the help of God within the conscience. Of this we are positive: The Sabbath Day must be different than any other day, and that difference must be on the side of the better, with ideals and standards that are of the highest, controlling our coming and going of the day, including God in Christ, as the constant companion through the hours. Given a person who makes the day a holy day, that person will have no difficulty in maintaining the sanctity of all the other days.

Another thought: "The Sabbath was made for man." But it was not made for man the secularist, nor the commercialist, nor the epicure. It is for man the helper, the religionist, the culturist, the minister, the inspirer, the constructionist, the brother, the Christian. Furthermore, it is a day for man and beast, for rest of secular tool and task, not only in the name of religion but in the name of health and nerves, efficiency and strength. "The Sabbath law is written in the human body." "Abolish the day of rest," and "this Republic could never survive by a century" was the opinion of Daniel Webster.

Margaret Sangster says:

"When the name of Doctor Charles M. Sheldon, editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald, is printed on the cover of a book, the reader is assured of a good, solid literary ability, of a sunny sense of humor, and of more than a bit of inspiration. The Christian Herald, in announcing the publication of Dr. Sheldon's newest book, feels that it is giving a splendid treat to the people who love a good worthwhile fiction."

"Heart Stories" is a collection of seven interesting tales, six of which never have been published before and all now published for the first time in book form. There are stories of college and of affairs of state; of the trials of a young minister and of the struggles of business men. There are stories in which youth fights the good fight, there are stories of near failure, and there are stories of love.

"All of the seven stories will prove profitable reading."

PRECIOUS BIBLE PROMISES

THE Christian Herald has published a beautiful 320-page cloth-bound volume entitled "PRECIOUS BIBLE PROMISES"—a collection of the promises made to mankind in and through the Bible.

The best description of the book is its own index:

1. Bible Promises to Believers.
2. Bible Promises Relating to Troubles in Life.
3. Bible Promises of Spiritual Blessings in This Life.
4. Bible Promises of Blessings in the Future World and many other chapters containing hundreds of inspirational verses from the Bible.

Nothing comparable to this is available elsewhere and we have taken much pleasure in choosing this as our gift to our own re-newing subscribers.

HOW TO GET IT

If your subscription expires in April or May tear out the coupon below, fill in and mail with $2.00 to pay for your renewal to The Christian Herald for one year and 10 cents additional to cover mailing charges on the book and a copy of this valuable 320-page cloth-bound book will be sent you, postpaid. You may send $2.00 for a new subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you a copy of "Precious Bible Promises" free. The book sold separately, postpaid for 60 cents.

Born in 1856, he entered the ministry at the age of nineteen and served pastorates in Columbus, O., Newtonville, Mass., and Baltimore before going to Chicago in 1887. Early in his Chicago work, he preached what later became known as "the $2,800,000 sermon," appealing for aid for boys and girls of the city, as a result of which P. D. Armour offered financial help in the founding of Armour Institute, and Dr. Gunsaulus became its president. He was the first to advocate the maintenance of kindergartens by city churches, a movement which has spread widely, and for many years he was a leader in civic betterment movements in the Middle West. In recent years, Dr. Gunsaulus had been less active and his writings less frequent, but his vigorous patriotic utterances during the war attracted much attention.

DOMESTIC

HUGHES SENDS DEMAND TO PANAMA. Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State, has sent to the Republic of Panama a note demanding that Panama live up to the awards made by former President Loubet of France and Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court regarding its Costa Rican boundary. The Loubet award was made in 1900 and the White award in 1914, but Panama has held the disputed territory, despite pledges to accept the decision as final, and a recent armed clash between the two countries was stopped only at Secretary Hughes's demand.

SPECIAL SESSION TO OPEN APRIL 11. The special session of Congress will open April 11, and will consider especially tariff and revenue revision and other domestic problems. President Harding indicated that he would urge legislation to furnish relief to the farmers as the first business for Congress.

DEBS CASE REVIEW ORDERED. President Harding has directed Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney-General, to review the case of Eugene V. Debs, now in the Atlanta penitentiary, and Presidential action on appeals for Debs's release was to be delayed until Mr. Daugherty made a recommendation.

UNION MEN VOTE ON PACKING STRIKE. Meat-packing unions have conducted a vote on the question of striking against wage reductions announced by the packing companies, but final decision was held up pending a canvass of the vote, which was said to favor a strike, and a conference of union leaders. A plan for "industrial democracy" offered by the packers was assailed by labor leaders as conceding nothing.

HARVEY ACCEPTABLE TO BRITAIN. Announcement was made in London that the British Government has given formal approval to the appointment of Colonel George Harvey as the American Ambassador to succeed John W. Davis. This preceded any public statement by President Harding regarding his intentions as to the London post. Myron T. Herrick was said to be slated for Ambassador to France.

FOREIGN

FORMER TURKISH VIZIER SLAIN. Talaat Pasha, former Grand Vizier and Minister of Finance of Turkey, was shot to death in the street of a Berlin suburb by an Armenian student who announced that he was avenging his parents and the many thousands of Armenians massacred while Talaat Pasha was the dominant figure in the Turkish Government during the war. Talaat disappeared almost three years ago and few knew he was hiding in Germany.

SIX EXECUTED IN DUBLIN. Six young Irishmen—two convicted by court-martial of murder and four of high treason—were hanged in Mountjoy Prison, Dublin, while twenty thousand persons knelt in prayer in the streets about the prison and all business and public activity in the city was suspended.

A. BONAR LAW RESIGNS. Andrew Bonar Law, Lord of the Privy Seal, has resigned from the British cabinet, ill-health being given the reason.

Dr. Sheldon at Sioux Falls, S. D.

DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON needed no introduction to the people of Sioux Falls, S. D., although something like forty years had elapsed since he spent any time in that city. He was invited there by the Ministerial Alliance and all of the Evangelical churches of the city united in the meetings. The Episcopal minister, Dean E. B. Woodruff, president of the Alliance, presided at the meetings. His church united heartily in the services, together with the First Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational and Lutheran churches. Never before have we had such a unanimous effort by the Protestants of Sioux Falls.

Dr. Sheldon spoke on Saturday morning, before the students of Sioux Falls College, and again, on Monday morning, to the students of Nettleton Commercial College. Many feel that his address on "The Essentials of a True Education," was one of the finest that has been heard in Sioux Falls for some years. For the Sunday night mass meeting, the city Coliseum was secured and it was filled to its capacity. The choirs of the various churches were united and after they had sung two good Gospel songs, Dr. Sheldon was introduced and spoke for an hour to about 3,500 people. At the close of the address a collection of over $400 was taken for the famine sufferers of China.

On Monday morning a conference of the ministers and Christian workers was conducted by Dr. Sheldon in the First Baptist Church, during which time the visiting preacher discussed with the local ministers some fundamental needs in doing effective Christian work.

The Episcopal church was filled for an afternoon meeting on Monday, when emphasis was laid upon the healing work of the Spirit of God, and following a very hopeful message from Dr. Sheldon, many sought private interviews with him and Dean Woodruff.

The closing meeting of the two-day conference with Dr. Sheldon was held Monday night in the First Methodist Church, at which time he spoke upon "The Value of a Man."

All of the ministers of the city felt that Dr. Sheldon's coming was a great blessing and emphasized particularly the importance of united Christian endeavor to accomplish the work given to the churches. G. ELTON HARRIS
Secretary Sioux Falls Ministerial Alliance.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent., are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6½ per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107½ per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent., are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7½ per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent., are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co., 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Liberty Bonds Now an Excellent Buy

"THE foundation for making America a thrifty nation was laid during the first Liberty Loan campaign when for the first time in the history of this Nation people were taught the lesson of saving their dollars," said an authority on financial questions recently. Some short-sighted people have disregarded this lesson and disposed of their bonds during the period of market recessions.

The fact that the market price of Liberty Bonds has depreciated along with the securities of other governments and corporations had absolutely nothing to do with their intrinsic value. As a matter of fact, Liberty Bonds are exactly as good today as they were on the day the Government sold them. The mere fact that they have depreciated in price makes this a more opportune time to buy them because they yield a larger return.

The causes of present prices of Liberty Bonds are numerous. An outstanding fact is, that the call for money to carry on manufacturing and industrial activities has compelled many large holders of Liberty Bonds to sell them. Many employers finding it necessary to obtain large amounts of cash to carry on business, buy raw materials, pay wages, etc., have chosen to sell their Liberty Bonds because, being the best securities in their possession, relatively speaking they had depreciated the least in market value. Such of course, while regrettable, no doubt has prevented the shut-down of many factories. These and other factors created a situation where there were more persons desiring to sell their bonds than there were people wanting to buy them.

The Government is, of course, not responsible for the low prices of Liberty Bonds. It is simply a case where John Jones sells his bonds to Jim Smith through the machinery of the market, for less than he paid for them, the Government having no part in the transaction.

In the open market the loss of one person may be the opportunity of another. By retaining his bonds and by buying more at present prices the investor is therefore benefited, as by so doing he averages down the cost of his bonds and increases the yield. These bonds, while depreciated in market value, are backed by the entire strength and resources of the Nation. The Government has made a definite contract to pay interest at regular stated periods and to pay the face value when the bonds mature.

It is generally believed that in five years or perhaps sooner we will have stabilized our present economic conditions so that Liberty Bonds will regain their 100 per cent. value in the market. While we may differ as to time, we are unanimous with respect to the ultimate outcome. It is, therefore, incumbent on all of us to hold on to our Liberty Bonds and to avail ourselves of present market conditions to purchase more bonds at present advantageous prices.

JOHN GOODE, the Bowery Mission evangelist, whose preaching tours during the last few seasons have been markedly successful, is planning a series of evangelistic visits during the next three months. Mr. Goode—long known as "The Wicked John Goode"—is now being widely used in bringing into the Gospel fold men for years given over to criminal lives.

An unusual instance of the effect of John Goode's appeals occurred at a Bowery Mission evening meeting recently when a lad of sixteen, impelled by a power beyond his control, stood up and said he had a confession to make. He had robbed his employer of $72, which he had been sent to deposit in bank. Now, he was determined to do as the evangelist had urged, to confess to God and acknowledge his guilt to the authorities. This he did, and it is hoped his confession may prove to be a turning-point in his life.

Any churches, Sunday schools, or other organizations desiring a visit from John Goode may address him to the care of the Bowery Mission.

Here Are Magazine Bargains You Have Been Waiting For

The Christian Herald clubbed with leading magazines at actual pre-war prices.

Through the co-operation of other publishers, the Christian Herald is able to extend you this wonderful opportunity to subscribe for the leading magazines for 9 months at just about half the price of a full annual subscription.

An unusual condition has made this special offer possible: During the past year a general paper shortage necessitated the suspension of several issues and these magazines extended subscriptions so that subscribers would receive a full year's credit. Consequently, many thousand subscriptions which should have expired with the November and December issues were carried over until February and March.

In order to allow these subscribers to get back on the calendar-year basis arrangements have been made with these popular, leading magazines to offer 9-months subscriptions at remarkably low prices. You may be one of the many who, anticipating a reduction, deferred subscribing last year because of high prices. But whether or not your subscription expires in the early spring you should take advantage of this unusually low-priced offer.

Questions and Answers

M. R. A. C. HARTE, of the Young Men's Christian Association, Jerusalem writes us as follows: "For some time I have been thinking of writing you concerning the Christian Herald Orphanage in Jerusalem. I have several times visited this orphanage and have been forced to the conclusion that it is one of the best managed orphanages I have seen in any country. I can not recall anywhere having seen an orphanage where the children are being so well prepared to meet the needs of the life in their own country, and improve their environment. The children in this orphanage are not only being taught their routine studies, their work and good manners; but also are being taught to do cheerfully their part and do it well. I hope the Christian Herald will find it possible to continue this splendid piece of work in Jerusalem."

Theo. S., Manito, Ill., writes: "What are the annual expenditures by the people of the United States for luxuries such as cigars, cigarettes, tobacco, jewelry, soft drinks, perfumes, etc.?"

According to the World Almanac for 1921, in the last fiscal year the people of the United States spent $22,700,000,000 for luxuries as shown by the Government returns including $750,000,000 for face powder, cosmetics and perfumery; $300,000,000 for furs; $800,000,000 for cigarettes; $510,000,000 for cigars; $500,000,000 for jewelry; $250,000,000 for musical instruments; $2,000,000,000 for autos; $350,000,000 for soft drinks; $400,000,000 for toilet soaps; $800,000,000 for tobacco and snuff; $250,000,000 for ice cream; $50,000,000 for chewing gum; $350,000,000 for cake and candy; $3,000,000,000 for "luxurious services"; $5,000,000,000 for food luxuries; $3,000,000,000 on joy rides, pleasure resorts and races.

Mary L. G., Terryville, Conn. Your letter has interested us deeply, and we sympathize with those who, through circumstances, are unable to join in all the great benevolences of these times. One of the effects of America's gift of bread to China will be to make the work of the Christian missionaries easier, and the hearts of that people will open to those who have shown sympathy with their suffering.

Mrs. S. J. P., New Haven, Conn. Send your name and address to the Secretary of the Prayer League, Mr. A. C. Baker, Bowery Mission, New York, for enrollment as a member. No fee is necessary.

A. D., Sutherlin, Oreg. There are certain temperaments that are extremely sensitive, especially in spiritual matters. Conscience, that inward monitor which God has placed in our hearts, sometimes seems to speak in clear and articulate words. The message may be one of rebuke or of warning; or it may be one of encouragement in a certain line of action. I is well to heed these admonitions and to ask for wisdom, that you may fully understand. Take counsel with some godly woman of Christian experience. Talk with her frankly. Tell her your hopes and fears, as you would tell an older sister. The heart needs someone to whom it may unbosom itself at such times, and Christian counsel is always to be valued.

"Troubled Soul," Herrington, Kans. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

M. E. D., Mt. Pleasant, Ia. 1. We have already explained in the Christian Herald that there are two Gypsy Smiths. One is a veteran evangelist, a very able Bible scholar and preacher, who has conducted many successful spiritual campaigns. The other is a young man from England who has done Gospel work during the war. His evangelistic ministry began only a few years ago. 2. You should ask permission of the church officials in question. It rests with them to say whether one of a different faith would be welcomed or not.

Mrs. Martin Williamson, Vale, S. Dak., writes: "I am writing you in regard to getting help in our Mothers' Club. I would like advice as to what we could do to be a real, practical help to the mothers in this club, as well as an uplift to the community. Some talk about telling one another how to make cake and pie. Most any mother knows how to make good eats, when we have good things to make them with. I think when a busy mother leaves her home to do club work, we ought to have something worth while to do. But what to do and how to do it is what I am anxious to know."

Here is an opportunity for those of our friends who have practical views and some experience to discuss a subject that should interest many mothers. The women folks at Vale, S. Dak. and no doubt at many other places, would be glad to get suggestions as to Mothers' Club programs.

25,000 Words Frequently Mispronounced

There are 25,000 Chances for You to Make Yourself Ludicrous in the Pronunciation of English Words

And yet the man or woman of good breeding cannot afford to take a single one of them.

You should be familiar with the proper pronunciation of these 25,000 tricky words and be ever on your guard against misusing them.

Speech occupies so important a place in the society, business and professional life of our day that its intensive study is practically becoming the hobby of all intelligent citizens.

Slipshod and incorrect pronunciation is taken as a sure sign of careless and indifferent breeding.

A Blunt Mispronunciation of One Important Word May—

Spoil the charm of your conversation—Ruin a good speech—Make a lecture ludicrous—Destroy the power of a sermon—Discount a sales talk—Lessen the prestige of a teacher, and invite derision and discomfort.

Your train of thought may be valuable and interesting—your grammar may be correct—your appearance faultless—but you destroy the effect of all these if your spoken English is shabby and imperfect.

You may avoid all this by obtaining the new volume.

A Desk Book of 25,000 WORDS Frequently Mispronounced

Compiled by F. H. Vizetelly, Litt. D., LL. D., Managing Editor of The New Standard Dictionary; author of "A Desk Book of Errors in English," etc.

It indicates the correct pronunciation of English words, foreign terms, Bible names, personal names, geographical names, and proper names of all kinds current in literature, science, and the arts. In addition to this, all words that are likely to prove stumbling-blocks, are included. The preferences of the principal dictionaries of the English language are placed on record, and national peculiarities indicated and explained.

Send for the ALADDIN Catalog Today

Price of above includes all material for completing both buildings—one hundred other California bungalows, Colonial Bungalows, Cottages, Two-story Homes, and latest information on building conditions.

YOU are sure to find an Aladdin Home to suit your tastes and pocketbook for the variety ranges from a few hundred dollars to homes costing fifteen thousand dollars completed. They are built of the very highest quality lumber to be had and designed and constructed according to the very highest architectural standards. They are not "portable," "sectional" nor "fabricated." They are real homes constructed exactly as any well-built home in your neighborhood. The Aladdin catalog gives all these details.

Read the experience of Mr. Gustave Anderson, of Lemont, Illinois, who recently wrote: "I am just finishing my new Aladdin Readi-cut Home. I have erected it on spare time only—some of my friends helping part of the time. We are very pleased with it and think more of it that I was able to build my own home, not being a carpenter myself. I found the blueprints very simple and did not have any trouble to speak of to find the place for the different pieces, and I was also very careful to follow the directions for piling the lumber, which was a great help. I found that material exceptionally good, and every piece went exactly where it was intended to go, and fit perfectly when put in place. The finishing lumber was particularly fine. I figure I have my home now at about half of what it would otherwise cost me, and I will heartily recommend Aladdin system of readi-cut homes to any one desiring to build an exceptionally attractive home at a very low figure."

We have thousands of letters from satisfied owners of Aladdin Readi-cut Homes who have had the same experience as Mr. Anderson. No matter where you live there is an Aladdin Readi-cut owner near you to whom we will gladly refer.

Aladdin Prices Now Greatly Reduced

Present Aladdin prices are based on the below-cost figures. Rather than lose more money the great timber and lumber producers have already closed down.

Aladdin System

Saves Labor. All the materials are cut to fit in the Aladdin Mills ready to be nailed in place on the job. This saves about $\frac{1}{3}$ of the carpenter's wages.

Saves Lumber. The Aladdin system of standardized cutting to fit of materials saves 18% waste of lumber. This means 18% saving on the cost of the lumber.

Saves Time. You purchase all the materials from one source and they are all on the job ready for you when you want them. Your home is not delayed for weeks and months before completion.

National Homebuilding Service

Aladdin Homes are manufactured and shipped direct from the Aladdin Company's own mills in North Carolina, Mississippi, Michigan and Oregon. Wherever you live, Aladdin Homes come to you in a straight line from the nearest timber region.

Aladdin's National Homebuilding Service means shorter routes, quicker delivery and lower freight rates for builders in every part of the United States. Three days to a week are saved in shipments reaching destination.

Common sense points to immediate action for the prospective home builder. Aladdin cannot continue very long to accept orders at present prices. It's your opportunity

Price Includes All Materials

The Aladdin Book of Homes has a message for you. Amongst its pages, profusely illustrated in colors, leading home designs are represented.

Aladdin Homes are cut to fit as follows:

Lumber, millwork, flooring, outside and inside finish, doors, windows, shingles, lath and plaster hardware, locks, nails, paint, varnishes. The material is shipped to you in a sealed boxcar, complete. The book, "Aladdin Homes," gives complete information on the Aladdin guarantee which assures you of highest quality of material. The History of the Great War IN TWO VOLUMES 750 Pages, Illustrated. Fine Cloth Binding, Embossed.

Thomas H. Russell, A.M., LL.D., the editor-in-chief of this thrilling history of great world events, has done his work in a masterly manner and received invaluable assistance from governmental official sources, not only from our own, but from the British, French and Canadian Governments.

The Greatest of All Dramas unfolds itself in the pages of this work, so intense with the thrilling stories of eye-witnesses, that the reader gasps at the tremendous and startling spectacles caused by this war of many nations. Actual photographs, many of them furnished from the records of the Allied Governments, embellish the work throughout and are in themselves a great pictorial history.

A New Series of 32 Pages of WORLD MAPS in Colors corrected as defined by the decisions of the Peace Conference and the terms of Peace, and bringing the World War down to the signing of the Peace Terms, is included in the second volume with America's part in the war fully given with information from official sources.

"This is an authentic, well-tabulated book of all information about the Great War, armies, navies and leaders of all countries involved."—Chicago News. These two volumes sell regularly for $3.00.

JERUSALEM

Its Redemption and Future

Fine cloth binding. Sells regularly for $1.00.

The book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands. It is a volume which should be in the possession of every Christian man and woman in America.

THE HOLY WAR

By John Bunyan

Every one can take a lesson from this great work. A fac-simile copy with illustrations from a $7.50 edition. Cloth binding. Sells regularly for $1.00.

ON RECEIPT OF $5.50 we will also include Free of Charge these three extra books in the shipment. This will give you seven fine books for the regular price of three.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

The Man as I Knew HIM, By Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D.

432 pages, fine cloth binding, well illustrated. Thousands of copies have sold at $2.00 a copy.

"Other lives will be written, other stories told, but there will always be a place for this. The Roosevelt with whom one walks, and whom one comes to know as he turns the pages of this book is the lover of all things true and noble."—Rev. Luther B. Wilson, Methodist Bishop, New York.

Dr. Iglehart's close relationship to Roosevelt is verified by a letter from William Loeb, Jr., the Colonel's private secretary while Governor and President, dated Jan. 9, 1920, which says:

"During my association with Colonel Roosevelt, from the Governorship of New York until his death, I know the high personal regard and warm affection he had for you. He always counted on you as a disinterested friend, and consulted you frequently on important moral, political and patriotic questions."

"The author has thrown new and authoritative light on some of the most interesting and important episodes in Roosevelt's career and has added new details to fascinating figures in American history. It is a book which all who appreciate Roosevelt will appreciate."—New York Tribune.

KING ALBERT'S BOOK

This is a unique book. A wonderful collection of special articles by famous people all over the world. Beautifully illustrated with color plates. Exceptional value at $1.50 a copy.

Never before, perhaps, have so many illustrious names and autographs been inscribed within the covers of a single volume, but KING ALBERT'S BOOK has a significance which even transcends its distinction.

Actual Size 8x11 inches. 26 Superb Illustrations Embellish This Great Work. A Genuine Photogravure Frontispiece Portrait of King Albert. 17 Beautiful Color-Plate Reproductions From the Work of World Famous Artists. These Color Plates Are Mounted Separately on Their Pages and Are Worthy of Framing. 8 Monotones. The Illustrations Make a Fine Gallery of Art.

THE CALL OF THE BELLS

By Edmund Mitchell

1 vol. 12 mo., cloth. 400 pages. $1.50 a copy.

"The Call of the Bells," is one of the strongest, most virile and red-blooded books ever published. It is full of dramatic situations, heart interest and tender pathetic incidents. It teaches us a doctrine of Faith—Hope and Charity—of sublime belief in Him—and that no man, no matter how low he has sunken, but can be raised again.

The story deals with such vital national issues as the reconciliation of capital and labor, the regeneration of the idle rich, the reclamation of the hobo, the dignity of toil, the moral strength of temperance and the more equitable distribution of wealth, comfort and happiness.

REMEMBER $5.50 WILL BRING ALL OF THESE SPLENDID BOOKS TO YOU

This is a valuable selection of informative books for any home bookshelf. We have sold many thousands of them, but there are still thousands who would be benefited by owning them. This is an exceptional opportunity of securing them at less than the wholesale price to dealers.

These combination offers have proved a great success with readers of the Christian Herald. The great saving is apparent. Timely books on worth-while subjects should be added to all home libraries. This is a list that will prove a profitable investment for anyone. The bargain is for you if you act quickly.

$5.50 will make you the owner of all six works, seven volumes, prepaid to your post-office

The Prohibition Movement in Italy

Economic Conditions Are Impelling the Nation Toward Restrictions on Intoxicants

By

PROFESSOR DAVID LEVI-MORENOS

(Italian Expert on Agriculture)

PROHIBITION in Italy? Ask that question of the average Italian and he will not understand what you mean. You might as well suggest to him that the sun is rising in the west or that the Tiber is flowing up hill. Prohibition to Italians is one of the inconceivable things, things that happen in crazy countries like the United States, where there are also Edisons, skyscrapers, gold mines, Niagaras and other fantastic impossibilities. And yet . . . and yet, if not prohibition, at least very direct and extensive limitation of the consumption of alcoholic drinks is one of the contingencies that Italy is destined to face in a future not very remote, not perhaps for the reasons that have turned America dry, but for others just as imperative, just as cogent.

The sorry fact is that, economically speaking, Italy has been "seeing snakes" for some years now; and what was already termed a national disease of "economic alcoholism" before the war, has reached since 1915 the acuteness of a national delirium tremens.

The situation can be stated in a nutshell.

Italy produces forty-eight million quintals of wheat annually. She consumes, however, seventy-eight millions. This leaves a deficit of thirty million quintals to be imported. In Italy the state retains the monopoly of grain importation. That is why the price of bread instantly becomes a political question of nation-rocking magnitude. Governments rarely dare to raise the price of bread. They prefer to pay for the wheat imported out of the general budget, extracting the money from the country in less direct and obvious ways. The bill for wheat thus shouldered upon the tax-payers in the year just past amounted to five billion lire—a billion dollars in ordinary conditions of exchange. That would be no bagatelle even for countries far richer than Italy.

Meanwhile Italy produces wine—wine of exquisite excellence and wine in abundance.

KEEPING in round numbers the annual wine crop in Italy attains a value in excess of ten billion lire—three and a half times as much wine as wheat, three times as much wine as Indian corn, five times as much wine as olive oil (a precious source of Italian wealth), ten times as much wine as silk. Bearing in mind the importance of agriculture in Italy, it becomes significant to say that one-quarter of all Italian agricultural produce is accounted for in wine. Something over eight million acres of Italian land is taken up by vine culture. Something over twelve million barrels of wine come annually from the Italian presses. The situation is not materially changed by the annexations of land resulting from recent war. Over a fifth of the total area of the Trentino, for instance, is covered by grapevines.

Now if a private individual had his cellar full of Satan juice and his pantry quite empty of food, everybody knows what he would do. He would sell the fire water and buy what he needed to eat. Unfortunately, nations are not always so wise as people, taken one by one. In just such a fix, the Italian nation drinks most if not quite all of the wine in its cellars, and then blames the government for not providing the bread.

While the food question and the high cost of living is keeping the country hovering on the edge of social overturn, the patent fact that stands out is that Italian wealth in grapes would, if properly utilized, more than take care of the deficit in nutrition. The fact, indeed is so obvious that a phrase has become of a commonplace among Italian economists and statesmen: "Italy must drink less and export more of her wine." This remedy is so simple that it would seem almost any ministry would have thought of it. But yet, if you look into the national account book and find the figure, you discover that, in spite of everything, Italy exports still barely more than one per cent. of her enormous wine output.

While it might be desirable for Italy to stimulate wine consumption abroad, it proves impossible to make other nations drink more than they can hold. But that is not really the point either. The principal element in the case is that the Italian people like wine, and drink wine enormously. When it comes to selling abroad, there is nothing left to sell.

TO BE quite just, as well as out of concern for scientific accuracy, it is well to bear in mind the principal factors determining what has been so well called Italy's economic alcoholism—the excessive preponderance of vine culture in the national agriculture over the production of foodstuffs. Italy is an admirable place to grow the vine. Its soil, broken by innumerable hills, and the character of its climate have from time immemorial made the country preeminent for the quality and variety of its wine flavors. Italy had been toying on wine for centuries at a time when the intoxicating fluid of the grape was still unknown to the rest of Europe: and the Latins were singing "nunc est bibendum" hundreds of years before alcohol had been brought to the American continent.

In a very amiable way, Italy's prominence as a resort for travelers—the tourist has for centuries been a figure there—has rested upon the proffered solace of her wines. This ancient tradition, going back to the dawn of history itself, is at the bottom of the Italian devotion to wine.

But the important extension given to wine production in recent years, and herein lies the source of our main trouble, is due to other circumstances. Some years ago the French discovered that their own wines of high grade could be improved by "cutting" them, mixing and tempering them with the product of Italy, especially of southern Italy. It was in anticipation of this market that vine culture was taken up by leaps and bounds in many southern Italian provinces where grapes had before been rarely cultivated and wine-drinking practically unknown.

In the second place, Italy was unusually successful in the technical expertness required in the fight against the peronospera and the filoxera, the two dread pests that nearly exterminated the French vines. Between 1890 and 1910 more and more Italian capital went into the vines because the profits to be made there were certain and enormous. Investments in wine production rose nearly to thirty-three billion lire, not counting the three-quarters of a billion circulating among vineyard laborers, who, statisticians have computed, devote a total of 450 million working days to the growing of grapes and the making of wine.

THE output of these great investments of recent decades has not, however, gone abroad to build up a favorable balance of national trade for Italy. What we have witnessed is a growth of domestic wine consumption of proportion commensurate with the supply. Perhaps social unrest has figures as a cause here. People have called for bread and they have been fed wine to keep them quiet. At any rate, the great industrial centers of the north have shown a phenomenal increase in alcoholism. Undoubtedly also the artificial activities of the wine-producing interests to protect and enhance the values of their investments has done something to stimulate wine consumption. No difficulty has been experienced in the last few years in developing flourishing wine markets in provinces of the south, which by age-long tradition and custom had been relatively "dry."

Defenders of wine-producing interests advance the argument that any attempt to reduce vineyard

A New Chance for Bobby

He Had Gone Far Astray in His Boyish Choice of a Profession

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT WAS with a tearful face that little Mrs. Brent waited for her large, competent husband to come home. Somehow she seemed incapable of settling problems without his help—somehow she seemed unable to face issues squarely without his arm about her shoulders. She was on the lowest step of the porch, her crumpled scrap of a handkerchief pressed to her quivering lips, as he swung along the street. When he looked up, after closing the prim white gate that kept passers-by from the temptation of the Brent flower garden, she was half way down the walk to meet him.

"Dearest," she quavered, as she flung herself against his broad comforting chest, "Dearest! I'm so upset—so terribly upset. What shall we do?"

For one second Robert Brent allowed the flicker of a smile to touch the corners of his pleasant mouth. He had so often been greeted by Mrs. Brent's wail of anguish—so very often! He allowed himself to consider, briefly, as he drew his sobbing wife close, what it would seem like to have a wife who made her own decisions—who did not have to be babied. At one time he had admired, greatly, the helpless, clinging-vine sort of woman. But his admiration was beginning to wear a bit thin about the edges, after years of being clung to.

"Well, honey," he questioned just a trifle wearily, "what's the matter now?"

Great tears were rolling down his wife's wan face. She gripped his coat sleeve with nervous fingers.

"It's Bobby," she wept. "It's Bobby!"

Over Robert Brent's face swept a shadow. Earnestly he looked into his wife's brimming eyes.

"Bobby's not—hurt?" he questioned, "He's not hurt?"

Mrs. Brent's curly head shook violently. With a ducking movement she buried her nose in the region of her husband's coat lapel.

"No, he's not hurt," she quavered, "it's much worse than that!"

Again the vague smile flickered across Robert Brent's face.

"But, dear," he said comfortingly, "if you're well and Bobby's well—there isn't anything else that matters! What's worrying you, anyway? Surely that young son of mine hasn't done anything vicious?"

MRS. BRENT lifted her tear-stained face with an amazing suddenness.

"Yes, he has done something vicious," she sobbed, "Oh! I didn't think that my boy would ever be a thief! I wouldn't have believed it if the teacher hadn't sent a note home with him, telling how they'd found the pen-knife in his desk! And he admitted, when I questioned him, that he had taken it from her desk. He took it, he told me, because he'd always wanted just such a penknife. It folded up, in some curious way, and—" her voice drifted off into silence.

The smile had quite died from the man's face. His mouth was a grim line as he spoke.

"Bobby," he said slowly "is quite old enough to know the difference between honesty and dishonesty. I've talked with him, more than once, about being—square. Bobby is nearly ten. He should know that it is wrong to steal!"

All at once little Mrs. Brent had stepped away from her husband.

"Bobby did steal," she told him, and the tremor had almost died out of her voice as she said it. "We know that he did, for he admitted it to me. I sent him to his room to wait until you came home. He did steal but, Robert, he didn't lie! And he brought the teacher's note straight home to me. If he'd wanted to he could have destroyed the note, and nobody would have been the wiser. But he didn't want to. He brought it to me, and admitted everything that the note said. That shows, Robert, that he isn't dishonest—even if he did steal! That shows that he has the right sort of instincts. And when I," she was sobbing again, "when I sent him to his room he went in the most bewildered way—as though he didn't quite know why he was being punished. I don't understand—"

Robert Brent's eyes were shadowed. But at his wife's earnestness he forced a smile. "Neither do I understand," he told her gravely, "but it will be all right, honey. We'll have Bobby come down, at once, and explain to us—" he hesitated over the choice of a word, "why he took the penknife," he finished.

AND so Bobby was sent for. And he came down from his bed-room, down to the cozy little library where his parents waited, with the shame-faced innocence of a puppy dog who has inadvertently upset a choice bit of bric-a-brac. A tall boy for his age, was Bobby—a boy who was developing big hands and feet, a boy who was fast losing the semblance of babyhood. Looking at him Robert Brent could remember—and it seemed only yesterday—when his curls had been clipped, when his first wee trousers had been bought, when, quite without his mother's knowledge, he had been presented with skates and a punching bag. He was smiling faintly, as he beckoned the child to his side. And Bobby, seeing that smile, took courage.

"Honest, dad," he gulped as he hurried across the room; "honest, I didn't mean t' be bad. Honest, I didn't!"

The man's big arm encircled the child's tense body.

"I know that you didn't, son," he said, and his tone held a gruff note of comfort. "I know that you didn't! But I don't quite understand. Tell your old dad all about it!"

The boy's eyes were big and pleading. His hand, upon his father's coat sleeve, was screwed into a tight little fist.

"She had a knife, my teacher had," he explained with the almost inarticulate brevity of youth, "she uster leave it on her desk, awful careless, where everyone could see. It was a bully penknife—it had four blades an' a buttonhook in it, an' the blades worked on a spring. I tried t' tell mother about it, but she didn't understand," his nod indicated the small figure in the background, that was Mrs. Brent; "women don't know much about knives, dad!" he paused, and then,

"I couldn't help wantin' it," he said wistfully, "it was so sort of shiny an' new—an' she left it around so careless! An' so, when they was all out at recess time—I sneaked up to her desk. An' I took it, and closed th' blades—she might've rusted 'em, leavin' it open all th' time—an' put it in my pocket!"

BOY is mostly lonesome when he's little;—grown-up folks Don't understand his notions or his silly little jokes,

They think he's sulky sometimes when he's only very shy,

And they think he's up to mischief when he doesn't meet their eye.

They smile when he is earnest, at his little loves and fears. They wonder at his laughter and they wonder at his tears: So a boy, who must have some one who will answer to his call,

Has a dog that he can talk to and can love the best of all!

Dogs don't laugh at you and tease you when you tell your secret hopes,

They don't ask you what you're doing with your barrel hoops and ropes:

But they gaze at you as if you are a hero from a book, With a world of trust and loving and confiding in their look.

Oh! a boy is always lonesome when he's little; grown-up

Think boys are either terrors or just silly little jokes; But a dog—a dog's a comfort and he makes their spirits rise, When he looks at them with loving in his almost human

Robert Brent's arm tightened around his small son's shoulder. "And," he queried cautiously, "and how did she know that you were the one who took it?"

Bobby's eyes were even wider than they had been.

"It was when she asked who took it," he explained painstakingly to his father, "It was then—I had to tell, you know. I couldn't lie, could I?"

All at once little Mrs. Brent's voice rose, plaintively, from the shadowy corner.

"But you stole the knife, Bobby," she accused, "surely it was just as wicked to steal as it would have been to lie!"

Bobby turned, from the circle of his father's arm, toward his mother.

"Only cowards an' slackers lie," he explained to her carefully, "but nice fellers—heroes—take things. It's diff'rent!"

"What," the question in Robert Brent's voice was very casual, "what makes you think that heroes and nice people take things? I'd rather like to know, Bobby, how you've reached that conclusion? By what lines of reasoning—"

A SUDDEN smile broke over the child's face. All at once he was a colorful, enthusiastic little figure. Even his voice was vivid.

"It was Hairbreath Harry," he said—"and Tom Dixon! They never let th' p'lice catch up with them, not ever! An' they set th' best detecitifes on their trail, an' the detecitifes never caught up with them, neither! An' then they got bloodhoun's. An' the bloodhoun's got left, too. Tom and Harry got away with th' jools—clean over th' border they got away! When I grow as big as you, dad," the boy's eager eyes were a-sparkle with enthusiasm, "I'm goin' to be a int'national thief. So is Dicky Jones. Dicky Jones feels about it like I do. I call him 'Tom,'" he confided, and "Dicky—he calls me 'Hairbreath'—that is, when we're alone!"

There was a plaintive sob from the corner. Mrs. Brent was crying again. But for once her husband did not notice the tears. All of his attention was focussed upon the small excited boy.

"So that's it," he exclaimed; "so that's it! At the movies, eh?"

His son nodded. "A swell fillum," he told his father, "called 'Dodgin' the Dicks.' A Dick is a detecitife!"

"Ah," Robert Brent's voice was thoughtful. "A 'swell fillum'! You liked it! Do they have many such pictures, Bobby? Do you go often to the movies?"

Little Mrs. Brent was speaking.

"Mrs. Jones and I," she told her husband, "let Dicky and Bobby go every Friday afternoon—by themselves—if they have been good all week. We always felt that it was a harmless sort of a reward for being good! We didn't know what sort of pictures they were seeing; we took it for granted that the pictures were all right! This," there was a note of defense in her voice, "this is a clean community, and the owner of the picture theatre is a church member—" her voice trailed off, helplessly.

All at once Robert Brent's tone was firm. "Really," he said, slowly, "really, it was our fault that Bobby took the knife. We should have been more careful!" He paused for a moment, and then—"Son," he said simply, "I want to explain to you just why it was wrong to take the knife. I want to make you understand just why you must never take another knife—or anything else—again!"

IT WAS later that night, after Bobby—with his young code of morals all re-organized—had been sent to bed, that Robert Brent talked the whole matter over with his wife.

"We must face the situation squarely," he told her, "we must do our best to keep the boy from any other mistakes! No—" his hand patted her hand soothingly, "don't cry so! I don't think that we'll ever have this sort of trouble again. Bobby understands now. But there may be new troubles that we haven't dreamed of. Have you any suggestions—?"

Little Mrs. Brent's misty eyes were filled with perplexity.

"I don't like to keep him away from the movies," she said, "all the other children are allowed to go. And yet, if he keeps on seeing crime plays—" she hesitated, "crime plays and plays with vampires, and—and sex plays—I'm afraid that we'll have to keep him away from them!"

Robert Brent shook his head.

"I don't know what to say," he told his wife, "he certainly must not see cheap and trashy pictures but I'd hate to have him miss some of the really fine and inspiring things that might—that undoubtedly would—help him. I'd hate to have him miss the travelogues and the educational films. And I'd hate, more than anybody else, to have him feel that we were in any way curtailing his fun. We can't regulate matters by putting chains upon Bobby. We've got to go at it from the other side, from the angle of the pictures."

All at once Mrs. Brent was glowing with an idea. "Why can't we regulate the pictures?" she questioned. "Why can't we parents get together in a better film movement. There must be other children who are as susceptible to an idea as our son. Surely their mothers and fathers would co-operate with us?"

Robert Brent's voice was as enthusiastic as her own when he answered. "I believe, dear," he said, "that you've got it! I believe that we can regulate matters!"

And then they talked very seriously, and far into the night.

THE next morning Robert Brent accompanied his young son to school and interviewed a certain teacher. It was a long interview, punctuated with a laugh or two. And when it was over the teacher walked to the very door of the schoolhouse with Bobby's father.

"I didn't understand," she said, in parting. "I was very stupid, I think! Your son has always been such an honest little chap—and I don't in the least blame him for wanting the knife—", she paused and her smile was very sweet.

Robert Brent shook her hand warmly.

"I'm glad," he said, "that you do understand. And I'm glad that you are going to help us. I'll expect you at the meeting, tonight!"

And, "I'll be there, surely!" answered the teacher.

It was not only upon the teacher that Robert Brent called that morning. He visited the president of the board of education, and the pastors of the two churches, and the mayor of the town, and the owner of the motion-picture theater, and some of the prominent business men. It was nearly noon when he started toward his office. But he was well satisfied with the morning's work.

That night at eight o'clock they gathered in the town hall, the people that Robert Brent had called upon and the people that they, in turn, had spoken to. The meeting was a large one for, in a small town, news travels quickly.

"I did a bit of missionary work, myself, this day!" little Mrs. Brent whispered to her husband. "I went to call on the mothers—"

Yes, the meeting was a large one. The town hall was nearly crowded when Robert Brent walked to the front of the room.

"I want to tell you," he began, "about my little son. It's a story that may interest you." And, speaking quietly, he told the story of Bobby and the stolen knife, told it through from the beginning to the end. And then he sat down in his place.

There was silence for a moment. And then, all at once, Bobby's teacher was talking. "I talked well, and convincingly. And she, too, told the story of Bobby—from her side—told the story of Bobby and of the other little Bobbys that are under her daily charge. 'Sometimes,' she finished, 'they do things that seem hard to explain. And sometimes—not always—those things can be traced back!'"

A mother was suddenly on her feet.

"My Paul," she told the roomful of people, "tried to set fire to our hayrick yesterday. He'd been to see a picture called 'The Firebug.' I've forbade him to the pictures, anymore!" She sat down heavily.

The pastor of one of the churches rose, quietly. His raised hand brought silence to the room.

"It seems a shame, Mrs. Anderson," he told the mother, "to keep Paul away from the pictures. I enjoy the pictures, myself, and get much inspiration from them. It seems a shame—"

ROBERT BRENT nodded, smilingly, at his wife. The situation was shaping nicely to their plans. His smile brightened as the owner of the motion-picture theater rose to speak.

"Of course," said the theater owner, "you're blaming me! You're saying that the show I give isn't a clean one. But—", his face was clouded, "it's hard to think of everything, in this business. I can't censor every point of every picture. I can't cut all the action out of my shows. And there are people—" he paused, "who ask for the same features that you object to."

For the second time Robert Brent was speaking. "I know—we all know," he told the harassed, "that you're in a difficult position. But so are we of us who have children! And so we're going to you for co-operation—not for excuses. We're going to ask you to become the chairman of a committee that we're going to form tonight. And we're going to ask you to put your personal O. K. upon every picture that you show in your theater. We know that it is not easy to blot out every unworthy feature, but we're going to ask you to do it, just as efficiently as you can. We want you to show only the cleanest and the finest pictures that are made!"

The owner of the theater was a shade embarrassed.

"Just what will you do—just what action can you take—" he questioned, "if I should refuse to co-operate with you? What would happen if I should let an objectionable picture be shown?"

Robert Brent's face was almost stern as he answered.

"If you allow an objectionable picture to be shown," he said, "we shall demand—as a body—that you forfeit the money that the picture has earned for you. We, the mothers and fathers of this town, shall leave the theater. And we shall demand back our price of admission. One or two such pictures would, I think, prove to you that we mean business. But if you should insist after such action, upon showing more of them, we might be forced to even more radical measures. We might be forced to open a rival house—for clean photoplays—under the auspices of the school board. And in time," his voice was even sterner, "you will realize, I am sure, that you have made a mistake. Don't you think after all that it would be wiser to come in with us?"

The owner of the motion-picture theater stood, for a moment, considering. And then, all at once, he was smiling. "I guess," he said slowly, "that you and your Bobby have won, Mr. Brent!"

From all over the room came the sounds of approving shouts, of enthusiastic hand-clapping. One of the ministers said "Amen!" loudly. But little Mrs. Brent, a large round tear sliding down over her cheek, was looking across the crowd into her husband's eyes.

Bible Study in Official Washington

Mrs. Selden P. Spencer, wife of the junior senator from Missouri, who has conducted a Bible Reading Class among the wives of members of Congress which had an attendance of several hundreds each week.

WE ARE accustomed to think of the nation's capital as a place of social and political activity, a center given over entirely to worldly affairs and marked by a corresponding decadence of religious life. Now refreshing then is the assurance that this view of Washington, D. C., is incorrect and that the true life of official life is one of hopeful religious activity. The widening of religious activities was particularly manifest in the official life of the capital through the efforts of Mrs. Selden Spencer, the wife of the junior Senator from Missouri, who introduced to the official set a "Bible Reading Class" which she has been conducting each week in the ball room of the Willard Hotel, and which has had an attendance well up toward the thousand mark.

Mrs. Spencer is the daughter of Rev. James H. Brooks, D. D., who presided over a Presbyterian flock in the same St. Louis church for forty years. She found in Washington, as elsewhere, that the spirit of the age and the variety of activities inclined even the religiously minded toward mental unrest and had a tendency to keep them outside the church door. She saw that ignorance of the Bible was getting to be a dangerous thing, and she embraced the opportunity to gather into one studious assemblage, the wives of Senators and representatives.

But the story of this interesting work is best told by the little woman who inaugurated these Lenten services.

"Our Bible Reading Class," Mrs. Spencer explained, "developed from Dr. Charles Wood's inspirational suggestion to me—'Throw out your anchor.' I was entertaining the pastor of the Church of the Covenant and when he asked me how I was enjoying Washington life, I replied: 'I fear I am slipping.'

By ANNABEL LEE

"Then why don't you throw out your anchor?" were his next words. "But what can I do in this vortex of social and political life?" I asked. "It is so difficult to refuse the social pleasures and so easy to go along the lines of least resistance. What can I do? The only thing I can think of would be to start a Bible reading class, and I don't know just how great a task that may be."

"Dr. Wood encouraged me by saying that 'rank imposes obligation' and by suggesting that if the wives of our national lawmakers should set the admirable example of studying the Bible, it might have a far-reaching effect when it became known. The next day I had a conference with Mrs. J. I. France, wife of the Senator from Maryland, and we immediately sent out invitations to the wives, daughters and mothers of all Senators and representatives in Washington to participate in a Bible reading class. We met at first in the home of Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, who was the daughter of a Senator, the wife of a Senator, and now is the mother of a Senator. Mrs. Elkins gave us the use of her ball room, which was large enough to seat comfortably the few who made up our first audience, and then we had to move to the Washington Club to accommodate the increasing number. Mrs. Elkins assumed the rental and we were quite comfortable in the club house until our membership reached the seven hundred mark, when once more we were forced to look for larger quarters. It was then that Mr. Hight, the manager of the Willard Hotel, offered us the ball room. The attendance is still steadily increasing and the enthusiasm for the work convinces us that all Christian women must have breadth of view, while the union of their sympathies in our scriptural reading is one of the hopeful signs of our efforts. It is the amount of service they give and the spirit with which they give it rather than the creed they profess which widens the religious activities of Washington's official life.

"The members of the class usually do all of the reading and the seriousness of the study is made obvious by the close application to the topic and prompt attention to the hour for the service. There are no stragglers arriving late. There is no music, nothing to distract from the concentration on the lesson at hand."

"While the Lenten season will close the class reading in the Willard for this season, it does not end organized Bible reading among the women in Washington by any means. I am in charge of a Bible class of the Business Women's Council which meets every Friday evening from six to seven o'clock and this instruction goes on during the whole year. There are 1800 members of the Women's Council, of which Miss Ethel Bagley, sister of Mrs. Josephus Daniels, is the head. The work done by this civic organization is indeed praiseworthy. Emphasis on creeds has given place to emphasis on work, and these members are practically applying to daily life the spiritual gain from their close study of the Scriptures."

Has Russia Seen a New Light?

WHAT has been actually occurring in Russia—what has been passing in the official Russian mind—is a mystery which the correspondents have striven in vain to solve during the last six months. The sphinxlike, immovable silence of Lenine, the Soviet Premier—of whom Trotzky is but the echo—could be construed in various ways. It has been evident for months past that internal troubles were interfering with the plans of the Red leaders, and that their hopes of stirring up a world revolt were gradually dwindling. At last the truth seems to have come out in an unexpected quarter.

Captain Francis McCullagh, who in the beginning of the winter foreshadowed a coming change, has apparently had his prediction confirmed by the utterances of Lenine. In speaking to the Tenth Communist Congress in Moscow, the leader declared that the time had come for the "abandonment of communism and of propaganda looking toward a world revolution," and that unless this was done, the Moscow government could not stand. "If we do not take to heart the lesson we have learned," he said, "and make this assembly the turning-point in our economic policy—the point indicating the maximum of unity of the proletariat—sad words will have to be said of us!" This is the first unequivocal admission that Lenine and his associates clearly recognize a change in conditions that now make world revolution, which was the dream of the Bolshevik leaders, a thing impracticable. With ruin threatening at home, Russia was not going to be helped by revolution abroad. The first duty, therefore, was economic restoration. This could only be effected with the help of foreign influence and capital.

It is yet too early to measure the full import of such a change in the Soviet policy as the admission implies. Nevertheless, it must be regarded as a hopeful gleam of returning sober sense on the part of a nation which has been given over to terrorism and madness. Sketching the future, Lenine further said that the immediate task is to bring about the gradual change from small scale to large scale industry, and to get the latter into efficient working order. The agriculturists must get all they need to aid them in their productive work. Co-operative labor must be encouraged, and the middle class peasantry—the small agriculturists—must be satisfied. There must be freedom of trade and freedom for the small proprietor, who must be helped in every way possible.

Coming close on the heels of the suppression of the Kronstadt rebellion, the change in the Moscow government's plans is significant. It is evident that the projected world revolt had dwindled in proportion as revolutions at home multiplied. Other indications of the new purpose dealing with Russia's reconstruction as the first and most urgent problem, are found in the news that a peace treaty between the Soviet and Poland has already been signed at Riga, Russia promising an indemnity of $15,000,000 in gold, and cancelling Poland's former debt to Russia; also in the news that Russia and Japan are approaching a basis of agreement in the Far East.

IT IS difficult to estimate how far the new program is to be regarded as announced in sincerity. It may be that Lenine, with characteristic adroitness, is covering up the real situation to encourage foreign capital; or it may be that, tired of the long struggle and mindful of hidden perils, Russia is really moving toward reconstruction on the only basis available. Already the change has won trade relationships with Italy, Germany and Great Britain. A few more months ought to bring such developments as will still more clearly reveal the policy by which Russia hopes to effect a transformation of her domestic affairs, and also of her trade relations with the outside world. It will indeed be almost a miracle if the same leaders who have kept Europe so long on edge should, by a swift change of front, become instrumental in a very large degree in bringing about pacification and economic restoration, not in Russia alone, but among her European neighbors as well.

If Russia's 150,000,000 population, or any considerable proportion of them, should be won over to the new political psychology of Lenine, and see in it the promise of greater freedom and security, of undisturbed land holdings, of wage workers against profitably employed, and of business enterprise reaping its due reward, his sudden reversal of attitude might easily be hailed as inspiration. They may picture it as foreshadowing vast changes for the better, and be disposed to acclaim it as the dawning of a new era for their country. But there may still be hidden dangers ahead, with plots and counterplots, and risings incited by ambitious leaders. Russia is a big country, with meagre communications and with a population of many races intermingled. After the years of terrorism and strife, time would be needed for enlightenment and harmonization, and the long trail to peace may yet be marked by many a stumbling block. Out of it all may come a freer, more democratic nation—a union of states like that of which Kerensky dreamed, but which he failed to realize.

But the world will not accept Lenine at his own valuation, though some nations may do so. It will rather wait to see whether the professed change of heart was sincere conviction or merely a clever bit of political strategy, conceived mainly to impress England and ourselves and to open doors to Soviet traders and propagandists.

Reforming the Past

THERE is beyond question a wave of honest and intelligent protest sweeping over this country against the bad films, and motion picture producers and managers are beginning to feel it.

A group of film companies controlling ninety per cent. of the American output have made public their intention to reform the business and in the future give the public only those pictures that shall be free from objectionable features. These public promises of clean films are gratifying to the public which is demanding a reconstruction of the whole film standard. But what of the past?

There are some very bad films being shown all over the country by the companies promising to reform. But some of these companies say in effect that after investing millions in these questionable films they can not afford to withdraw them for exhibition.

How about that?

Must the public continue to endure demoralizing pictures because they were made before the pledges of reforming films were made?

Must the loss of money be set over against the loss of clean thinking?

Can the future be reformed unless the past goes with it?

A Noble Career Closed

IN THE death of Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, the country loses one of the great leaders in the movement for civic betterment. As pastor of Central Congregational Church in Chicago, and later as President of the Armour Institute of Technology, he wielded an influence which has served as an inspiration and example to many in our churches and universities. Dr. Gunsaulus was not only eloquent in address, but was a remarkably clear and cogent writer. He loved the common people and labored for their highest interests as few men have done in his day. It was through his ability that the great institution of which he was long the head came into being and attained its remarkable development. A pioneer in the advocacy of free kindergartens under church auspices, his ardent championship of the rights of the young to good moral and educational training has been the means of stirring up similar work in other cities. Amid all his activities he did not fail to keep in touch with the spirit of the times, and his ministry, no less in the class room and on the lecture platform than in the pulpit, was marked by strong and earnest support of the rights of youth and the duties of municipalities as well as churches to maintain and energize the training of the young.

Dr. Gunsaulus was for many years a frequent contributor to the Christian Herald and his sermons were highly appreciated. His death is a distinct loss to the Christian ministry and to the forces of education and philanthropy.

Lost Values?

THE Department of Agriculture of this great and glorious republic issues ponderous volumes that the Tax-payer seldom reads, even if he does pay for them.

But we imagine the Farmer looking over the last Report might find a few pages interesting.

As for example the Report says very dryly but bluntly:

"The value of farm crops in 1920 was $5,105,000,000 less than in 1919. The chief reductions of value were corn, wheat, hay, cotton, tobacco and oats. The value of the corn crop alone has declined $1,500,000,000."

Old Man Ultimate Consumer wants to know where all this money has gone. If $5,000,000,000 have been lost who has them? Any Reward if found?

"Did You Know?"

THE editor is a curious person and sometimes to satisfy his curiosity he makes experiments. This is one of them.

He had been discussing with a friend the average intelligence of the average crowd which one sees on the street of any American city. The friend was disposed to be sceptical of the average intelligence of the crowd that flows along the sidewalks of big cities and to put the matter to a test the editor suggested that as they were walking along the street of a certain well-known city they put a question to individuals or to groups, as the opportunity was given and note the results.

It was not difficult to put the test into real practice. Stopping in front of a grocery store window were four men, looking at a display of fruits and vegetables.

The editor's friend also stopped and made a remark about the fine display of food, addressing his remark generally to the group of men standing there. One of them made a remark in reply, and then the friend said, speaking carelessly as if he took for granted the possession of the fact was general: "Too bad that food isn't in China."

There was a moment of somewhat surprised silence, and then one of the men in front of the window said: "Why? What's the matter with China?"

"Haven't you heard of the great famine in China?"

All the men looked more or less dumb, and one of them ventured the remark. "What famine?"

"Why, the great famine. Forty-five million people in danger of starving."

"Some story, eh?" another one of the group said. The others did not appear to be interested.

"Haden't any of you heard of it?" the editor's friend asked.

"Seems to me I saw something in the paper the other day," said one man. "I never paid much attention."

"I suppose you all read the dailies," the editor ventured to say.

"Sure," was the response from all four men.

"And you haven't seen anything about the famine?"

The men were moving along. But one of them said, showing a little interest, "Those Johnnies ought to save up some of their grub."

The editor and his friend pursued their questionnaire up and down that street, and met with an appalling ignorance from a majority of the people they asked. "Do you know about the great famine in China?" Most of them had never heard of it. A few acknowledged that they had seen some notice of it. All said they were newspaper readers. But the general ignorance was something frightful.

Is it any wonder in the face of such a general ignorance of one of the most tragic facts in the history of the world, and in spite of the prevalence of newspaper reading, that the public has to be informed again and again in order to make any impression on the average mind?

If you don't believe the general lack of information on even the greatest of human events, try it yourself. Ask any man you meet on the street of a great city, "Did you know forty-five million human beings were starving in China?" See what he will say.

To Our Canadian Friends

REALIZING the inconvenience and expense faced by Canadians in providing for the day-to-day fluctuations in exchange, we have arranged to accept all remittances from Canada at par, regardless of exchange. This applies alike to book purchases and subscriptions.

This puts our friends in Canada on exactly the same basis as those in the United States—except for the 50 cents additional charge on annual subscriptions required by the Canadian government duties and postal charges.

Allies Threaten New Penalties After Germany Rejects Demands

GERMAN affairs held the center of the international stage for the week with the reparations controversy again at a critical point, with the holding of the Upper Silesian plebiscite and with a fresh series of Bolshevik uprisings in Germany.

Germany's refusal of the Reparations Commission's demand for the immediate payment of 1,000,000,000 gold marks and for the payment of 11,000,000,000 marks additional before May 1 was followed by the despatch to the Allied Powers of notification that Germany had refused to fulfill her obligations under the Versailles Treaty and of a recommendation for action by the Powers. The Commission also sent a note to Germany declaring that she wilfully had violated the treaty and would be held responsible under penalties.

The German reply to the Commission's original demand was a declaration that Germany did not owe the money, insisting that the property turned over to the Allies exceeded in value the 20,000,000,000 gold marks due on May 1 under the Treaty, and added that "rudimentary technical knowledge" would show the impossibility of her paying such a sum in so short a time. It offered to present further arguments that the debt had been met and suggested the issuance of German bonds for the payment of any part of the sum which conferences might reveal to be due.

The Reparations Commission denied the right of Germany to question its appraisal of the deliveries made by Germany, expressed a belief she possessed the means of payment, and brushed aside the suggestion for a conference between Allied and German experts. It has been told before that the Commission valued the German deliveries at 8,000,000,000 gold marks, but details of how the German mathematicians reached their total of 20,000,000,000 marks are new. They put in a bill for all supplies they were unable to carry away from northern France and Belgium, and charged an enormous figure for the rights of the French in the Saare basin. They valued the military clothing left behind at 6,500,000,000 marks, which was sixty-five times the value allowed by the Commission. They charged 7,000,000,000 marks for the 2,000,000 tons of shipping surrendered—$875 a ton in American currency—as against the 1,000,000,000 marks the Allies are willing to allow.

Another Allied conference will be held soon to determine what further action shall be taken against Germany. Sentiment in France favored the imposition of extreme penalties, and one French official went so far as to hint at the occupation of Berlin.

Germany Wins Silesian Plebiscite

THE plebiscite in Upper Silesia, a territory rich in minerals and of great industrial importance, resulted in a majority of 245,000 out of a total vote of nearly 1,200,000 in favor of its retention by Germany. Only three of the seventeen areas into which the province was divided for electoral purposes returned majorities in favor of Polish sovereignty, and the distribution of these areas complicated the task of making an equitable disposition of the territory. One Polish district is in the center of the province, another is the southern area bordering on Poland, and the third is a mixed area lying north of the industrial triangle in which are located the coal mines and iron foundries.

Under the terms of the Versailles Treaty the Plebiscite Commission which supervised the election is to present to the principal allied and associated powers a full report on the votes and a recommendation as to the line which ought to be adopted for the frontier. This means that the Allied Supreme Council will determine the boundary unless the United States insists on participating in the settlement and sends a representative to the Council's sessions.

Germany declared that Upper Silesia constituted "an indissoluble national, geographical and industrial unit," demanding that it should be awarded to her in its entirety, but in official circles in the Allied countries it was believed the province would be divided. France has been allowed to take the lead in the Supreme Council regarding Eastern European affairs; and her bitterness against Germany and her close ties with Poland made it probable she would seek to enlarge Poland.

The plebiscite was conducted without serious disorders, though the intense feeling had caused many minor clashes between partisans before election day. It was followed by rioting sufficiently serious to induce the Interallied Commission to proclaim martial law in several districts.

New Outbreaks in Germany

WIDESPREAD Communist uprisings in Germany—uprisings which German officials declared to be due directly to the work of the Bolshevik régime in Russia—caused many fatalities, but failed to assume proportions which threatened the stability of the Berlin government. The Reds gained control of several towns, but in most instances their mastery continued only for a few hours and the prompt despatch of troops to the disaffected areas prevented a spread of the movement.

Organized labor vigorously opposed the spread of the Communist movement and the Executive Board of the Trades Union Federation adopted a resolution denouncing the attempt to provoke a general strike and warning its members not to follow the Communists. Berlin and its suburbs, where in the past the Reds have displayed great strength, were comparatively quiet, although there was one bomb explosion, and three persons were killed and several wounded in street disturbances.

Hamburg was the scene of the most disastrous riots, and thirty persons were killed there in a day, but the police soon were successful in gaining the upper hand. The Communists held out longest in Saxony, and the government there named a civilian commission to deal with the emergency in accordance with President Ebert's proclamation of a "non-military state of siege."

The movement showed that the extreme elements no longer have at their command the great numbers which responded to earlier calls for rebellion.

Russian Overtures Rejected

A FORMAL proposal for opening trade relations between Russia and America has been despatched to Washington by the Soviet government in the form of a message to Congress and President Harding, expressing the hope that "intimate and solid ties would be created between the two republics, to the greater advantage of both." It recalled Moscow's efforts to obtain peace, voiced a desire that America "will not persist in obdurate following" Mr. Wilson's hostile policy, mentioned the conclusion of treaties with other nations, and wound up with a proposal for the sending to America of a special delegation to negotiate upon the matter of trade.

One paragraph was particularly significant in view of announcements of a reversal of the world-revolutionary policy of the Lenin régime—a pledge that the Bolsheviks would refrain from propaganda in the United States. "The Soviet republic," the message stated, "entirely absorbed in the work of internal reconstruction and of building up its economic life, has not the intention of intervening in the internal affairs of America, and the All-Russian Central Executive Committee makes herewith a categorical declaration to this effect."

Secretary Hughes issued a statement for transmission to Russia which announced that the United States could not even consider entering into commercial relations with Russia so long as the present communistic economic system is continued in that country.

It left the way open, however, for further exchanges and the final sentence read: "If fundamental changes are contemplated, involving due regard for the protection of persons and property and the establishment of conditions essential to the maintenance of commerce, this government will be glad to have convincing evidence of the consummation of such changes, and until this evidence is supplied this government is unable to perceive that there is any proper basis for considering trade relations." The issuance of the statement followed a cabinet meeting devoted almost entirely to the Russian situation.

Packing Strike Averted

CONCESSIONS by the big meat-packing companies and by their employees have brought a temporary settlement of their dispute and a strike of the 100,000 workers has been averted for several months. The agreement was reached at a conference in Washington, participated in by representatives of both sides, and by Secretaries Davis, Hoover and Wallace.

The men accepted the wage cuts of eight cents an hour for hourly workers, and of 12½ per cent for pieceworkers announced by the packers, while the companies agreed to restore the basic eight-hour day and overtime rates. Any applications for changes in pay or hours are to be submitted to Judge Samuel Alschuler as administrator, and he is to retain until September 15 of this year the jurisdiction conferred by the war-time agreement of December 25, 1917. The agreement will terminate on September 15, and one of the labor leaders termed the settlement a "truce to prepare for war."

The three federal secretaries were gratified by the success of their mediation, and their opinion that wages must come down was an important factor in obtaining an agreement. They were hopeful that this success would help toward amicable settlements of other industrial troubles. President Harding received at the White House the participants in the conference and Samuel Gompers, and congratulated them on their success.

Irish Fighting Intensified

THE execution of five young Irishmen in Mountjoy Prison, Dublin, far from producing quiet by terrorizing the Irish republicans, has resulted in new and widespread outbreaks of violence. In five days sixty-three persons were killed and sixty-seven wounded in the intensified clashes between the Sinn Feiners and the Crown forces. The Sinn Fein argued that its men were belligerents and that the execution of those captured constituted a breach of the laws of war which was punishable by reprisals. Vengeance was threatened

The Altar in the Home

A Sermon by REV. S. A. WILLARD *

TEXT—Gen. 13 : 18. "And Abram moved his tent and came and dwelt by the oaks of Mamre, which are in Hebron, and built there an altar unto Jehovah."

IT IS time to return to fundamental things. As in the business world this is being emphasized, so must it be in the spiritual life. We have been living too much in the superficial, too much even in what we call the active circle. We are placing too much reliance on things we do, and too little on the things God can do in us.

When we speak of the home, we speak of a subject that touches all, even those who have no home, but to whom home is a thing longed for, yet never experienced. About home twine life's tenderest ties. Our fondest remembrances center there; our dearest, earthly hopes spring from it. Home is at once our sheltering place, our refreshing place, the center of our earthly lives, the inspiration of our dreams.

Socially, home is the citadel of human society. It is the very foundation. There is nothing socially beyond the home but the solitary individual. In the home is the first social altar, an altar whose fires spring from the united flames of the secret altars of the hearts that gather there; an altar whose light shines into the outer world.

We have been told that the groves were the first temples. This is not true. Homes were the first temples. The first altars were those of family firesides. It may have been true that the altar was erected in front of the tent, under a tree, as Abram's; but it was first the family altar. Go back to primitive ages. You will find a family worshipping, the father the priest, or sometimes the mother, the rest about him, and the home the temple. Later, families gathered together, then a community, a tribe, a nation; and some day it may be a whole world will, as it were, worship God from a common altar.

THE links of worship are three; the personal altar, the family altar, and the group or community altar. Take religion out of the individual heart, and the others fail. Take religion out of the home, and the public altar will be low, and personal religion will lose its chief place and opportunity of expression and recuperation. Take away the group altar and the common tie of human brotherhood is rent. The chain is imperfect, lacking either link. But the middle link is central in its influence and the most beautiful, because the ties are close and relationship is unselfish.

The Jewish people are noted for their distinctiveness among the peoples of the earth. This is due to their emphasis on religion in the home. Like them we should learn to place the emphasis where it belongs. Israel was especially commanded to teach the words of the Law unto the children. Listen to the "Shema," which was ground fairly into the being of every Hebrew child:

"Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is one Jehovah. And thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be upon thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down and when thou risest up, And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates."

Obedience to this word has kept the Jews distinct, after being without a national home for nearly nineteen centuries. The answer to their marvelous tribal vitality is the power of religion taught from father to son through forty centuries.

IF I had the power, much as I believe in the Church and Church worship, to put religion in its place in the home even at the expense of obliterating the public altar, I would do it. Religion in the home is more essential, more effective, more in its fundamental place. Of course, I do not mean that type of so-called worship at home where father wraps himself in the Sunday papers, the children in the "comics," and mother wears herself out getting "a big feast." If religion had its proper place in the home, the people would flock from the home altars to the community altar to unite with one another in the expression of their praise and love of God, and their love for each other. If it should have to be done that way, both we and God would be the gainers.

What conditions do we generally find? Do we find it generally true that the father is taking his place as priest of his home, the mother and others gathering about him in worship? Or the mother leading when necessary?

We relegate too large a part of the religious training of our children to the church, with the result that it does not get done. Even at best the church has them only a few hours each week. They need that and all we can give besides.

How much of the Bible do we teach? How many children there are who do not know the real story of Christmas! The Santa Claus story is beautiful, and we love it. It has a wonderfully beautiful lesson. But it becomes a profanation when substituted for the real record and what it is used to exclude the wonderful story of love that gave us our Christmas. The Babe of the manger is quite as much of God's love as the Christ of Calvary.

PARENTS, it is your supreme privilege to teach your children the things of God. How much is religion talked in your home? Do they see you kneeling, hear you praying, or know that you do thus pour out your souls before Him? Parents, it ought to be your lofty privilege to introduce your children to the Heavenly Father, not leaving that joy to the "Well, mother, why have you never told me about Him?"

Father came home. The little girl ran to him, and as he caught her up she asked the same question.

A little more put to it he told her to run away to her play. But that night, when the little girl was asleep, he said to his wife, "I think it is time we fitted ourselves to teach our little girl about Jesus."

We say, "A little child shall lead them" forgetting how the words were written. Shame on us, that we do wait till our little ones lead us to Him, when we should be the ones to lead them!

Home ought to be a holy place. Are we doing all we can to make it so? When father comes back at night tired and worn, does he come into a holy place or into a jangle and clash worse than the machine he ran all day, or an irritation greater than his business? When mother is tired with the day's labors or loads are heaped on her, does she find Christ-loving hands ready to help ease her load? Do the children find ever loving favor that is more than silver and gold? Do they live in a holy atmosphere? Is there ever rising the fragrance of the sweet incense of Christ-love from the altar there?

Oh, things may not be so ideal as this, but are all of us doing what we can to establish Christ as the Head of the house, as our wall-mottos say, "the joy of every heart," the center of our lives?

THE home ought to be sacred. Too often the vows of home-making are too easily taken and easily broken. We ministers know that. There would be fewer broken if those vows were taken with judgment, love and the ideal of holiness for the home. The home ought not to be easily broken. We ought to set a battlement of sacredness about it, so that those who think of entering thereon shall know that they stand on holy ground and that "nothing unclean or unselfish should enter therein."

Then, there should be the guard of true love, not mere physical attraction. True love is a binding tie, an inspiring spirit. One cannot love as one ought in the home, and willfully neglect it. One cannot love as one ought, and watch for petty chances to be grieved or angered. One cannot love as one ought in the home, and violate its purity. One cannot love his children and let them go without the atmosphere of reverence, or without leading them to the Divine love.

There should be the guard of faith in the Father above; love for Him and His ways. Every true human love is made greater and worthier if companioned by this greater love. Homes are too often wrecked for lack of the guard of faith. Home love is made perfect in it.

Take your home to God in prayer. In prayer bring your loved ones before Him. Ask Him to be all that He can be for them. Ask Him to help you do all you can to make your homes His holy temples, your loved ones His loving children.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus Shall Reign Where'er the Sun," or "Hark! Hark! My Soul!"

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Isaiah 11 : 1-10.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 275, first column.)

Sermon—"THE ALTAR IN THE HOME."—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"The Shepherd True," or "The Homeland, O The Homeland."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud: May the grace of God, which is free from all bitterness, the mercy of the Father, which is without any condition except repentance, and the love of God, which cannot be bounded by our human narrowness, be with us to comfort, inspire and bless, not alone us who seek it, but all whom we meet, until we meet again. In Jesus' Name we ask it. AMEN.

pastor, or to the leader of a little group of folks we call a Sunday-school class. Would you miss seeing them graduated from the public schools, except for the most urgent reasons? Why, then, miss being with them when they take the step from darkness into light, from death unto life?

The real fact is that family religion is out of date! We have lost much of it. The result is the children are being lost, and leaders for God's work are not being reared, for there is no soil. Take an all too typical day in an all too typical family. Father gets up early, grabs a bite to eat, sees no one of the family but the cook (who may be wife, daughter or servant) and rushes downtown or to work elsewhere. The rest of the family come stringing along as required by need or inclination. The children are up just in time to be rushed off to school. The great American home motto seems to be "Breakfast served at all hours." Night comes; everyone has some sort of engagement; fifteen minutes cannot be found for the family to be together for worship or for any type of home life. Work, worry, friendship, fun, a place for all but none for the culture of man's real self. We are so full we forget.

We live in cities we builded not, till fields we broke not, have a civilization that we have contributed but a small portion to, and we are so full we have forgotten that we were redeemed from the slavery of sin with priceless blood.

A LITTLE girl one day crept into her mother's arms. Her mother was of a very common type of Christian woman. "Mother," said the little one, "do you love Jesus?"

"Why, yes, dearie; why do you ask?"

SHALL we not go and set up our altars? Do you shrink before an unwonted task and unfamiliar ways, because of unskilled hands? God told His people that He wished not for an ornate altar, but that they should worship Him at an altar of unhewn stones, such as any man could lay up. You can set up such an altar. Your children will see you kneeling and hear you praying. What higher consecration can you make of your parenthood than to lead your loved ones to Christ? What richer heritage can you leave them than the memory of a home that was a holy temple of God?

A baby girl came to bless and try a mother's heart. She grew up to be selfish of her mother's time and attention. Her mother had been an active woman, interested in the good works of her community and particularly in a certain Sunday afternoon service. She missed these very much. In time, the daughter went away to college. One day the mother had her glorious reward. The daughter wrote:

"Mother dear, I know I was a selfish girl to demand so much of your time, and to keep you from the things you loved so well. But, mother dear, it was when I sat with my head in your lap that I caught my first clear vision of Jesus. And now I am going out in His name to bear that vision across the seas, to a people that has never known it."

Blessed mother! Ten thousand times rewarded! How much more than that woman who pinched and scraped to amass millions that she might, as she said, leave her son rich!

Have an altar in our homes? Have prayer in and for our homes? Yes, we will make them temples of God, ourselves the priests and prophets, that we may grasp the privilege of leading our own to Jesus.

The Daily Meditation

By Revs. J. H. Jowett, D.D., W. W. Bustard, C. C. Albertson, E. W. Caswell, W. L. Goldsmith, H. P. Hoskins and R. Braunstein

Filled with the Spirit

SUNDAY. Eph. 5:18. "Be not drunk with wine . . . but be filled with the Spirit." But how are we to become filled with the Spirit. Along what lines may we receive stimulus and inspiration?

The apostle supplies an answer which, to the worldly wise man, may savor of foolishness, and appear as a message for babes. "Speak one to another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." That is to say, one of the great means of revival and stimulus is to be found in the channels of fellowship. I am to take psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, the rich, inspired, Spirit-filled utterances of my brethren, and I am to use them for my own inspiration. Along the way of life they made discoveries, and I am permitted to share in the fruits of their painful toil. They trod the winepress, and I may drink the juice. They put their experiences into "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," in order that what to them had been a doubtful experiment may be to me an unwavering assurance.

I am afraid that, in our day, this means of spiritual stimulus is very largely ignored, and its loss is partly responsible for the flatness and low-vitality of much of our Christian discipleship. We can not afford to drop the hymn and the psalm out of our daily religious life.

They offer us the vehicles of the Spirit for the carrying away of fear and despondencies, and for the bringing in of a buoyant faith and peace.

Noah's mother used to say that whenever her son had a grief he turned it into a poem, and so got rid of it. We may not be able to turn our griefs into our own poems, but we may turn them into other people's poems, and so be rid of them. Stimulus is sometimes gained by mere expression. Souls are often heavy because of pent-up feeling. A mode of expression would be a means of relief. Utterance would be revival.

The means of utterance can be found in "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." In these we may find our stimulus. We may gain our inspiration from that which is inspired.

How else may life receive stimulus and inspiration? The apostle gives a second answer, as startlingly simple as the first. Stimulus may be found, not by drinking wine, but by cultivating gratitude—"giving thanks always for all things in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." Is not that profoundly true? An ungrateful heart can never be exuberant. Where there is no gratitude, the spiritual nerve is dormant or dead.

But how is it where gratitude abounds? The whole life is quick, alert, exhilarant, expressible. We say that a man's face "beams" with gratitude.

That is the right word. There is exhilaration within, and it reveals itself in a countenance illuminated without. Gratitude confers the quality of "aliveness" and acts as a stimulus to all the complex faculties of the soul.

The Church at Its Best

MONDAY. Phil. 2:1. "Fellowship of the Spirit." When the Church was at its best in the past it was characterized by at least four magnificent qualities.

In the first place it trenched in the Word of God. Since our boys have been in France, we know what it means to live in the trenches, fight in the trenches and die in the trenches. Once the Church of Christ trenched in the Word of God, it found its life and sustaining strength there. For a quarter of a century many in the churches have trenched in the criticisms of the Word of God, so the Book ceased to be the sword of the Spirit by means of which we were to conquer the world.

When the Church of the past was at its best, it was also deeply spiritual. It depended upon spiritual things with which to do spiritual work. It had the endowment of the Holy Spirit; knew the power of prayer, and exerted a faith that could do the impossible.

The Church at its best was also constantly progressive. One of the greatest facts in its history is this: "It grew." It grew in power, numbers, grace and knowledge. Growth is always the sign of life, and when a church stops growing, it means that decadence and death have set in.

When at its best, the Church was unselfish in service. Like its Master it did not seek to be ministered unto, but rather sought opportunities to minister unto others.

A selfish Church is a contradiction in word and truth. If really Christian, the Church must express itself in unselfish service toward God and man.

The Birthright of the Heart

TUESDAY. Eccl. 3:11. "He hath set eternity in their heart." A great poet has said, "Our reach is greater than our grasp—else what's heaven for?" The entire history of humanity reveals a perpetual unsatisfiedness. The eye is not satisfied with beauty, nor the mind with truth, nor the heart with love. We have faculties that outreach earth. We are endowed with a persistent illimitability. Plato took cognizance of this fact and saw in it a token of our immortality.

What did Christ come to earth to do? To confirm our intuitions of God and immortality? to add His sanction to our primary conviction that human life is made of finer material than dust, even though it be star dust. This He does when He claims us as co-heirs with Him to immortality. "Because I live ye shall live also."

It is a part of the heritage of every man that he has in his heart an affinity for God, let us say, a capacity for God, a hunger for God, a leaning to God. Is it "the desire of a moth for a star"? The moth may be attracted to the star, but it has no capacity for it. A penny candle is light enough for the moth. Nothing but God can satisfy the heart of man. It was a saying of Amiel: "What I desire is the sum of all desires: the knowledge I seek is the sum of all knowledge."

It is not necessary to prove that we have a natural inclination to God. The universality of worship is argument enough. This instinct, dim and uncertain, has been overlaid with error. At its worst, the capacity for God leads to superstition. At its best, with the aid of a special revelation, it leads to the experience of the Christian mystic such as John, Paul, George Fox, John Wesley or Mrs. Browning, who "smiled to think God's greatness flows round our incompleteness, round our restlessness His rest."

God Our Deliverer

WEDNESDAY. Ex. 3:12. "Certainly I will be with thee." Around the bush of fire Moses is called and commissioned to become the leader of Israel, out of Egyptian slavery into the freedom of Canaan's promised land. Moses hesitated about accepting the call, because of his slowness of speech and because he thought himself only a poor insignificant shepherd of the Midian desert.

He should have remembered God's providential deliverances when he was lying in the cradle of rushes in the Nile, in the midst of danger from crocodiles and the bloodthirsty Egyptian. He should have thought how he had been educated in all the learning of that ancient people; how he had been led to choose afflictions with the people of God rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Should he not have gladly yielded to the call of Him Who had been with him for eighty years in his eventful life? How near Moses came to losing the foremost position in all human history! Are not many others today declining to believe the promise, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world"? We refuse to be attracted by the flaming bush or the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, saying of ourselves, "Who am I? Only a desert toiler, called to go before the greatest monarch of the earth"? Happy the one who can say with Isaiah, "Here am I; send me!" "I am that I am; the name of Him Who hath sent me." God is with our mouth, teaching what to say and do. What an orator Moses might have been if he had yielded willingly to the call. His lack of confidence allowed Aaron, his brother, to eclipse him in the ministry of speech.

Cromwell, Luther and Knox were also slow of speech, but became mighty leaders under Divine guidance. The fear of man and the distrust of our own ability has often interfered with our greatest achievements.

Was not the picture of Moses leading Israel out of the slavery of Egypt into Canaan but a forerunner of Jesus coming up out of Egypt, leading the world away from the slavery of sin into the everlasting Canaan of peace and promise?

Our God is the great Deliverer; we are not alone when He is with us. He is now here and everywhere, making the desert blossom as the rose, making all things possible unto him that believeth; He is very nigh thee in thine heart and in thy mouth, saying "Certainly I will be with thee."

A "Willing Spirit"

THURSDAY. Matt. 26:41. "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." How often these words have been appropriated in palliating the foibles and frailties of human nature! Spoken originally by our Lord in charitable judgment of the drowsy disciples who could not watch even a single hour with Him, they have been used as a divinely sanctioned apology for every sort of moral disaster and defeat. Men hasten to assert the virtue of a good intention in the same breath that they admit complete surrender to wrong impulse. They excuse themselves on the ground of carnal weakness, as if their downfall had been inevitable, and unpreventable.

It is one thing to use these words in charitable judgment of others' failure; it is dangerous for one to use them in self-defense. One too easily persuades himself that he has a "willing spirit" when he has it not! Men sin for lack of strong, good intentions, which come by watching and praying.

Use these words, if you will, when you confront the sins of your neighbors, but by no means repeat them for your own comfort and peace of mind. Rather be severe in searching analysis of your own sin, and God will bring you unto true repentance.

The Shut Door

FRIDAY. Gen. 7:17. "And Noah went in." V. 16. "And the Lord shut him in." Professor Piazza Smyth has estimated that the ark was 625 feet long, 104 feet wide, 62½ feet deep, contained three decks and the hold and, being built without engines, funnels, smoke-stacks or coal bunkers, and being larger than many ocean liners, had a carrying capacity of over 3,000 persons. With all the spare room only eight persons were saved! This is significant, for as I read the old story afresh, I find nothing to indicate that the door was not thrown wide open for all who wished to be saved.

In every similar record in the Bible, where God draws the line of demarcation swiftly and arbitrarily between the saved and the lost, about the same conditions and results prevail. The saved are saved because they have faith enough to know that the only way to escape from certain death is by refuge in the arms of God. The lost are lost because they refuse to believe. They make no effort to be saved.

Material things have the preeminent place in the minds of the masses. It is inconceivable that a man should, for instance, give up a paying job because something about the job interfered with his religion. When "trade demands," the world bows down and many nominal Christians are found among those kneeling before the image. Noah was no doubt considered a narrow, pious fanatic, a man who had gone crazy on religion. It strains no imagination to say that he was hated because he was a courageous preacher of righteousness, and his own upright life was a daily rebuke to the bold and brazen sins of the people.

And so, after having pleaded and warned in vain, Noah and his family began to move into the ship which he had builded. And the Lord "shut him in." The shut door is significant. No man can shut the door upon the souls of other men, no matter how sinful or defiant. It is God who seals the fate of the impenitent, as He seals the salvation of others. "Let him that is holy be holy still, and let him that is filthy be filthy still." We find exactly the same lesson at the close as at the beginning of the Scriptures.

H. P. H.

The Vision Splendid

SATURDAY. Prov. 29:18. "Where there is no vision the people perish." Our visions are a transcript of our ideals. Our ideals are the things we desire to see come to pass. We may never reach the goal, but we shall never reach anything without striving toward that goal. Through the gateway of the ideal we find our escape from all that is sordid and unlovely upon earth.

It is this which transmutes our human values into terms of eternity, and glorifies our everyday care and vexations; to have an ideal of perfection before us and to see that slowly and surely we are making our lives conform to it—the ordinary matters of life and the things of misfortune count for little or nothing. In our watch-tower we are above every east wind that blows and every storm that breaks on our heads.

Your ideal and mine may not be the same. They need not be. You may call yours truth, beauty, health, wisdom, virtue, kindness, what you will. These are but facets of one flawless gem. You see one, I see another; we are both looking at some perfection of life. Our ideals are all in the same sky. Our angle of vision is from different directions.

We will follow the ideals that beckon to us most compellingly and attract us most strongly. Together we will do our best to get our fellow-traveler to take up the quest, and ultimately we shall find ourselves where the roads come happily together, at the foot of the throne of God. Ideals that are helpful and noble and inspiring and constructive are of God. They are bits of His infinity. They are the divine highways that lead into the Kingdom.

 Aunt Belle's
 Comfort Letters

I have written a Baby Book

Since I began this little series of comfort letters a great many mothers have written to me for advice about babies. And the funny thing about these letters is that a doctor would have found it difficult to answer any of them.

After all, bringing up babies is a trade which only mothers ever seem to master.

So some time ago I started to write a Baby Book which would discuss all of these interesting and important details about which only a mother knows or cares.

It seemed like a big job at first but as I got into it I found that most of the material was contained in my "Comfort Letters" and in my correspondence with thousands of mothers who have written me regarding their baby problems. I have consulted most of the big authorities in order to check up on my experience with my own babies and at the hospitals during the war.

Several people who are qualified to judge have told me that my book is the most useful and practical text book for motherhood that has been written.

The Mennen Company, who make Mennen Talcum, is publishing my book. It is beautifully illustrated, contains charts, tables, question blanks and is thoroughly indexed. It's the sort of book you would pay about a dollar for at a book store, but The Mennen Company will send out a limited number of copies for 25c.

That is because I frankly say in the book that only Mennen Talcum should be used on babies because it is pure, safe and endorsed by three generations of doctors, nurses and mothers.

Better fill out the coupon at once. Lovingly, Belle.

Finding New Animals

Research in the Far North Brings Two Discoveries

By FRANCIS DICKIE

ALTHOUGH hosts of explorers have been penetrating to all corners of the world for many years, and naturalists and big game hunters have been engaged in constant research, there seems every reason to believe that the world still holds many strange animals as yet unknown to civilized man.

This was borne out by information recently furnished to explorers by natives in West Africa of a queer monster, the description of which led naturalists and zoologists to call it the water elephant, a temporary title pending further investigation. It was described as being smaller than the true elephant, and living in the water, though amphibious.

Still more startling was the sighting by Mr. J. Lepage in the autumn of 1919 of an unknown monster in the Belgian Congo. Through his binoculars he had a good opportunity of viewing it. He described it as about twenty-four feet long, taller than a horse, with a great hump between the shoulders, two tusks, and an immense straight horn at the end of a very long snout. The director of the Museum at Port Elizabeth believes this to be a survival from the pre-historic ages.

Further proof that man has yet much to learn about the animals dwelling upon this globe was provided by the investigations of Professors Moreno and Rudolph Hantani in the Patagonian Andes, where they found bones and hair which they absolutely identified with the mylodon, a species of gigantic sloth thought to have passed from the earth long ago. Some of the skulls were of recently killed animals, showing the primitive people of this little known region had used them for food.

As further instances of the discovery of new animals may be cited the finding of the Okapi, the mouse deer and the forest hog in Africa in very recent times, though explorers had been penetrating into Africa for a long time before these species were finally brought to light.

It must be remembered that there are enormous portions of the world still little explored, such as the Patagonian Andes, the upper reaches of the Amazon, the interior of Australia and New Guinea, and lastly the wilderness reaches lying in northern Canada and Alaska.

IN THE vast terra incognita of northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory there were found recently two animals, one of which was unknown to science. This is the strange white bear, an absolutely distinct species. Zoologists were first put on the track of this species by the discovery of a small skin in an eastern furrier's establishment, by Professor W. T. Hornaday, the eminent zoologist. The skin was thought to be that of a baby polar bear, but the zoologist on examination realized it was the pelt of a full-grown bear, of a species unknown to science. The skin was traced back to the interior of British Columbia; and vigorous research carried on by Francis Kermode, Curator of the Victoria Museum, revealed that a new species of bear existed in the regions of the Skeena and Nass Rivers.

Only a few specimens, about two dozen in all, have ever been taken. The bear is smaller than the average black bear, creamy white in color, with no spot of color. The ears are very small. Its habitat is 2300 miles from the home of the polar bear. In recognition of the Curator's work the new species is called Ursus Kermodei. Apparently this species' numbers comparatively few members and is confined to a very small portion of the globe.

In the Yukon Territory, not a great many hundred miles from the region where the white bear was found, another odd whim of Nature was recently discovered in the Fannin mountain sheep. This sheep, while it cannot be described as a distinct species, still varies so much from the two other species known to science, that it seems Nature had just begun work on the evolution of a new type when she was caught in the act by man. The Fannin sheep, found only in a certain part of the northland, are in some cases pure white; others have white heads with bodies of varying shades of gray and brown stripes down the forelegs. The other types of mountain sheep in this region are the Dall, a pure white animal, and the Stone, a black species. Just why Nature should evolve an intermediate type is a mystery.

A Grasshopper Glacier

FOR several years the people who lived in the small villages in the neighborhood of the Beartooth range of mountains in Montana could be heard joking about a grasshopper glacier. When strangers asked questions they were told that several years ago, a man hunting for gold in these mountains reported that he had found a glacier covered with frozen grasshoppers.

This story was not believed by anyone, and because of the very bad storms on the icy mountain-tops, the miner was not able to return to the remarkable glacier so as to convince the people that he was telling a true story.

Not long ago, however, two men employed by the Government started to explore Granite Peak, a mountain which rears its great head nearly two miles and a half into the sky, and is the highest point of the Beartooth range.

These men were not able to reach the top of the mountain, and plant an American flag there, as they planned to do, but they did reach the wonderful grasshopper glacier, and brought back pictures and specimens which show that the miner's story was correct.

The belt of frozen grasshoppers runs the entire length of the glacier at the head of West Rosebud Mountain. It is about a mile long, and the bodies of the frozen insects lie so thickly that a person cannot walk without stepping on them, and when the wind blows, fragments of the insects are blown about.

No one can say positively how the grasshoppers came to be imbedded in the ice, but it is supposed that they tried to fly over the high mountain, and were frozen to death, because of their inability to continue the flight in such a high altitude.

One Week Ago

those pretty teeth were clouded by a film

We ask you to see, as millions have done, what one week can do for your teeth.

Your teeth are now film-coated—clouded more or less. Combat that film in this new way, and watch results.

Then you will know a way to whiter teeth, to cleaner, safer teeth. And that knowledge may bring life-long benefits to you.

Beauty marred by film

The beauty of countless women is marred by dingy teeth. And that dinginess comes from film.

The film is viscous. You can feel it with your tongue. But it clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The tooth brush, used in old ways, fails to end it. So the film absorbs stains, and eventually forms a cloudy coat.

That is why teeth discolor. The stain is in the film-coat, not the teeth.

Danger lurks there

But film does more than that. It forms the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film. Despite the tooth brush, they have been constantly increasing. Few people have escaped them. So dental science has for years sought ways to fight this great tooth enemy.

Two effective methods have been found. Able authorities have proved them by many careful tests. Today the two are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a scientific tooth paste. And leading dentists everywhere now advise its daily use.

Other protections

Pepsodent also meets other modern requirements. It multiplies the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. This to digest the starch deposits. With modern diet, rich in starch, these often remain to form acid.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's agent for neutralizing acids which cause tooth decay.

Pepsodent twice daily stimulates the forces in a natural way. Modern research proves this necessary. In all these ways it is bringing about a new era in teeth cleaning.

Five things to fight

The film on teeth.

The germs that breed there.

The dingy coats which film forms on the teeth.

The starch deposits which ferment and form acids.

The acid which attack teeth.

Pepsodent attacks them all in new, effective ways. Make this ten-day test and see.

Millions employ it

Millions of people now employ Pepsodent, largely through dental advice. The results are seen everywhere—in glistening teeth. And those clean teeth mean safer teeth—protected as never before.

Every woman owes herself a test. A 10-Day Tube is offered for the purpose. Get it and see what it does.

The night attacks

Film on the teeth or between the teeth may attack them during sleep. So may starch deposits. Acids form in such coats, and the acids soften the enamel.

Countless people who brush teeth nightly fail to remove all the film. And trouble frequently results.

You will not do this when you know the facts. You will use a film combatant. You will fight the acid and the starch. Modern dental science has evolved the ways to do this. Prove them out, for your sake and your children's sake. Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube, and a book which tells the reason for each new effect.

The road back to health

As convalescents gaze from the valley of sickness to the pleasant heights of health, the road appears steep and devious. They deserve sympathy and consideration; they need care. As a rule, if returning well-being is not retarded by constipation, the path grows increasingly straight and the journey ever less taxing.

Because of inactivity and lowered vitality, convalescents, invalids, and all sick people, as well as nursing mothers, are especially subject to constipation. To win back health, the body must be kept free from the drag of poisons generated by constipation. The body fights against these toxins, but in its weakened state the struggle is often unequal. Recovery of health is slow or the patient loses ground.

mended by physicians to train the bowels to evacuate regularly and thoroughly. It is especially valuable for use by convalescents, invalids, and those of enforced sedentary habits, because it works gently, without strain or nausea.

Action Unlike Cathartics

Nujol does not irritate or force the weakened system of the invalid—it simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to eliminate the food waste naturally from the system. Nujol helps Nature maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation at regular intervals—the healthiest habit in the world.

Nujol is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take. It is especially valuable in cases of sickness, debility or convalescence.

Bible Teachings About Work

International Sunday School Lesson for April 17

Mark 6:1-3; John 5:17; II Thess. 3:6-13

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THE mother of a son about to graduate from college said to her boy and a classmate who was visiting in the home, "You have learned much in the past four years, but I want to give you three rules for happiness and they are these—Work, Work, Work." Years of post-graduate experience have proved the value of the advice, which was real philosophy. The three passages of scripture which form the biblical basis for this lesson study exemplify the same great teaching. Jesus has been called the Master Teacher. He was also the Master Workman. The great work of creation, which was carried on by the Father and the Son, is suggested in the passage from John. It is sad when anyone cannot see in looking at nature that it is the work of God, and all very good. And God did not just make a perfect universe and then withdraw Himself from it, but He is the imminent God in maintaining His creation—worlds upon worlds.

Jesus, the Man of Nazareth, is the person pictured in the selection from Mark. He is the carpenter working in the shop in Nazareth, even as a lad working with Joseph, the reputed father. The Jewish boy, as was the custom, learned a trade. Jesus was no exception. From the early years hard work was a habit and He developed a physical body that could stand the rigors of those three tremendously hard and fatiguing years of His public ministry. It must always be remembered that, though the Son of God, He was also equally the son of Mary. The world does not have His thumbprint of physical measurements, but the fact of a strong well-built body is without question. Jesus was a graduate in the school of hard work. He could pull an oar with any of His disciples, even though they were fishermen. Classes of boys will be greatly interested in the full rounded manliness of Jesus. He could spend strength by day and then endure the night vigils while He prayed. He could remain awake while disciples slept.

Paul, the tent-maker, gives something of a pen picture of his life when he wrote that second letter to his friends in Thessalonica. Lazy people who are busybodies did not get any encouragement from him. To be sure he was brought up as a scholar at the feet of Gamaliel and could make wonderful addresses, but he could also work with his hands and earn his way as he went. His bread was sweeter because he had earned it by his own labors with the needle and canvass. There is a tremendously forceful appeal when such a man says with reference to earning daily bread, "Be not weary in well-doing."

THE dignity of labor is well established by such examples as Jesus and Paul. The early missionaries were all things to all men as they were forced to become jacks of all trades; and they wrought wonders, too. Many missionaries today are just the same in their handiwork. This is true on the home as well as the foreign mission field. If a boy or girl wants a place in life where their every resource will be taxed to the utmost let them decide to be a foreign missionary. Many people can do one thing well in holding a position in the home land while undreamed of talents are discovered and used on the foreign mission field.

Fathers who could afford it would be giving a richly worth-while post-graduate course if they would send son or daughter to some foreign mission station for a year to act there just as a "handy man." The experience might reveal just how little that beloved child was really able to accomplish.

While the writer was a pastor he was frequently invited to attend the graduation exercise of some daughter in the congregation and he has been known to get a negative answer when he asked that graduate if she could bake a loaf of bread. She could parse in French better than she could peel a potato. Boys have been known to buck a football line with force when they seemed unable to handle a hoe with over much ability.

Work is more appealing in these modern days and positions are being sought where service will render a value to society as well as to self.

Two illustrations come from the newspapers of recent date. A young girl was accosted by an able-bodied man in the upper part of New York City on a morning when the snow was falling heavily. He asked her why she was seeking to get down town on such a morning. She was a telephone girl and said, "I must go down to the exchange so you can telephone to your office that it will be impossible for you to get there today." A well-known captain of industry in Philadelphia just stated that he is giving away his entire surplus earnings since he has enough to live on for the rest of his days. When asked why he did not retire he told of the joy he had in work and he was unwilling to lose that real pleasure. The pay of this man was not measured by the amount of dollars received. His labor produced much more than money as a gain.

Every person should be at least able to earn his own way if he is physically and mentally able. The time may come when this ability will stand between him and poverty or charity. Talents possessed should be used and increased. Take a trial balance of self and decide whether you are a worker or a shirker. What are you able to do now? What can you fit yourself for, even though the time of preparation may require a number of years? Make a survey of others and note how they toil, and how little they often receive in the way of personal comfort after the day's work is done. Your part may be to brighten their lives. Work has a social bearing and the world is filled with labor problems.

THERE is some worth-while work for each class and department in your Sunday school. Make a survey of needs as you go around the walls of your local Jerusalem—your own church. Does your church need a stereopticon, a clock, new chairs or even a new pulpit Bible? Often the little children of the primary or beginners' department are located in the kitchen of the church or even the basement and the teacher is doing her best with very poor equipment for teaching. The church as a whole should work to better such conditions and the children can work to help the missionaries by sending Bible lesson cards and postcard pictures to the overseas fields. Boys and girls of junior and intermediate ages have abounding energies and abilities that can perform wonders by just a little directing. Let the superintendent enlist the co-operation of these members in something that is constructive even though it means hard work. One of the simplest tasks would be to use them as messengers to give out a card of invitation to each home within a particular area, asking the recipient to come to church next Sunday.

The adult classes of great stalwart men and women, who do mighty things during the six days of the week, can move mountains of difficulty on Sunday. Recently in Southern California a large class of men in a single afternoon raised sufficient money to replace a church which had been destroyed by fire. The home department superintendent and visitors can present some plan for work each time they call with a new quarterly.

The study of this lesson calls for more than just a survey of conditions. It demands active service on the firing-line of duty.

Dodge That Draught

AT THIS season of the year in particular, although it is very necessary at any season, it is important that we should guard against draughts as would poison. Why? Because of the chain of evil conditions which may arise from being subjected to them.

It May Start a Chain of Evil Conditions as Poison Would greater work upon the kidneys and a mild nephritis may result.

By DR. ROY KERR ELDRIDGE

FURTHER, when these muscles are in this contracted state, there is a residue of toxic substances remaining in these muscles. The poorer the circulation the less oxygenation there is and in consequence there are lessened secretions and diminished perspiration. The kidneys are forced to do their work, and the perspiratory glands as well, and so the toxic materials pile up in the system.

There is no more sensitive part of the body and none which it is so important to keep from undue exposure or injury, than the spinal region, with its thousands of nerve branches coming from the various spinal nerves. There are five layers of muscles in the back, and in the cases of influenza we find all these muscles extremely tense and sore, thereby impeding the blood flow and the nerve impulses to the various internal organs, and causing the so-called lowered resistance of patients. In the contraction of these muscles, if allowed to persist, there is gradual drawing of various spinal segments to one side ever so slightly, but enough to set up an irritation to its corresponding spinal nerve, thus setting up a possible chain of ailments.

Never have the bed placed so that there is a circulation of air blowing directly from a door or window across the bed where you are sleeping and through an open window on the opposite side of the bed; but rather have the bed placed so that there may be plenty of fresh air in the room without blowing directly upon you. Many a stiff neck and a hard cold has come from sleeping directly in a draught.

Too much stress can not be placed upon the necessity of watching for draughts wherever you may be or whatever you may be doing.

There are three areas of the body which are peculiarly sensitive to cold or draughts—the back of the neck, the small of the back and the soles of the feet. In practically every cold in the head or throat one will notice that there is a decided contracted condition in the back of the neck, and this may be called to your attention very painfully by a stiff neck. You may think back to some of your experiences after riding in an open car on a windy day, or riding on a train for some distance with a window open beside you, and note the truth of this. The muscles tighten to the extent of drawing the head around to one side in many instances.

Liniments or oil rubbed well into the muscles is the usual home remedy, but a gentle manipulation, skillfully performed, will relax or stretch out the contracted muscles and relieve the tension, and possibly headache or neuralgia.

It is a strange fact that you can face a driving storm and yet take no cold, but turn your back and let a slight wind blow upon your neck or the small of your back and, unless you are well protected, several disagreeable symptoms will develop in a day or two.

You may have only a slight headache or neuralgia, or it may be chills and fever.

If the person's back should be examined the muscles will be found tightened and contracted and the circulation thereby diminished. The spinal nerves and their branches are thus interfered with, and within a short time the back will be sore and painful. This may put

The Christian Herald a Favorite

IN WEST VIRGINIA the boys and girls on the farm like to read, and read the best of current periodicals. Late in 1920 the Extension Division of the College of Agriculture of West Virginia University asked the 5,000 members of the Agricultural Clubs located throughout the state to express in a vote their preference in magazines. The accompanying sketch was printed in the February number of the little booklet that goes out from the College to all the club members and shows the ten magazines having the largest number of votes. The Christian Herald is among them.

Nothing could make the staff of the Christian Herald happier than this evidence that the boys and girls of the country like their work. The great things that are to be accomplished in the coming years for country and for church will be accomplished by the boys and girls of today and in the pages of this magazine we want to speak directly to them—more directly in fact, than ever before.

We want the young people to read the Christian Herald because it will give them good, solid information they will need as citizens and as Christians. We want them to read it because it will give them inspiration to world-service. We want them to read it because it will provide a foundational faith in Christ and His good works.

In a sentence we believe that if boys and girls read the Christian Herald regularly now they will be better equipped to take their part as Christian citizens in their adult life. If you know any young people, call it to their attention and let them have the benefit of the inspiration, entertainment and information that every number contains. If you prefer, send to us the names of some of your acquaintances of eighteen to thirty years of age and we will try to interest them not only in the Christian Herald but in the Church and the newer conception of Christian responsibilities. We are receiving letters constantly from mothers and fathers telling of the influence the magazine has on the lives of their children and we would like to extend the influence to an even wider degree.

WHERE CHRIST IN NOT NAMED

THESEED IS THE WORD OF GOD. The seed bringeth forth of its own kind. Would you love to sow it in the interior of South America? The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. Much more truth or the asking.

REV. JOSEPH DAVIS, Sec'y
113 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

To the Christian Herald:

My husband wishes to join me in sending you a personal word expressing our deep gratitude for the splendid help you have given us at this time of awful need. Many thousands of lives will have been brought through safely through the Christian Herald Famine Relief funds.

We can not speak too highly of the splendid work that is being done by the famine workers, who would of course be helpless but for the funds sent to them. In visiting the famine area I was constantly impressed with the care taken by the famine relief workers to make the funds go as far as possible.

Again thanking you all for your sympathy and help,

Yours very sincerely,
(Mrs. J.) Rosalind Goforth.

Relief in China

By (Mrs. J.) ROSALIND GOFORTH

IT HAS been my privilege, though an infinitely sad one, to visit several mission stations in the North China famine area. At each place the help given through the Christian Herald was spoken of with gratitude and thankfulness. At one station held by a lady missionary, quite alone, I was told that for the first four months of famine she had received less than three hundred dollars for famine relief, though the district around her station was one of the worst. Then came $1,000 from the Christian Herald fund. "I just gasped when I saw it," she said, "for I had never received so large a check, but as I thought of the need it seemed I had never seen a check that looked so small!"

When looking over this lady's famine fund account I was amazed at the knowledge of details regarding every one receiving famine relief. She had given relief to three thousand out of the $1,000, enough to tide the people over till another gift of $2,000, also from the Christian Herald, came. This lady's bravery and courage, her marvelous efficiency and executive power constantly reminded me of Mary Slessor.

Two little children were brought in to the children's refuge while I was there. They were washed and wrapped in a warm quilt while new clothes were being made for them. Here I saw them, cuddled together nibbling food, a pair of living skeletons.

It was while waiting for my train on leaving this station that a little child of about six knelt before me piteously pleading for food. Though knowing full well the danger of giving help publicly in time of famine I just could not turn from those hungry eyes. Whispering to the men with me to get a little bread, I hoped to give it secretly to the child, but my intention became known and a mob of struggling, fighting women and children gathered in an incredibly short time, crushing against me so that some police near by hurried up and pushed the crowd back.

The death rate is rapidly increasing. Thousands have already fallen victims to this famine, but it is comforting to remember that millions would doubtless have succumbed before this but for the famine relief given.

In a recent letter, Dr. Percy C. Leslie, the treasurer for the Christian Famine Relief Committee, says: "One thing we must realize is that there is very little time left. All who give must give quickly if lives are to be saved. Urge this whenever you get a chance. Home peoples should cable their gifts now, return mails will be too slow." We must also remember that should belated gifts reach us they will be needed for the support of children who are now in the refuges, but who will have to be provided for at least temporarily. Many of these children will of course be able to return to their homes, but many will have become orphans.

Contributions to the Christian Herald's China Famine Fund for the week amounted to $9,759.10, bringing the total up to $511,387.07.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

I READ the letters from those who attest to answered prayer and those who seek Divine help," writes W., Chestertown, Md., "and as a father and husband, I want to join this circle. I ask all Christians who kneel in prayer at the Noon Hour to remember me in their prayers. I want spiritual guidance and increased faith. I also humbly ask God to strengthen me physically, so that I may be able to continue to provide for my family; and I ask for moral strength so that I may be able to accomplish something worth while in the sphere in which I move."

Prayers are also requested in behalf of a young evangelist and his wife who are conducting meetings in various places.

Mrs. F. H. asks prayers in behalf of a young man. She writes: "He is breaking the hearts of his mother and wife by gambling. I am asking you to pray that he may be brought to see the terrible results that will follow. Pray for the mother, also."

"Please pray that we as a family may be made able to live faithfully in the Master's service, winning souls for Him," writes a reader in Joplin, Mo.

Mrs. M. E. A. writes: "I am eighty-two years old and do not expect to be on earth much longer. I would like to see my family more zealous in the cause of Christ, and to be revived myself. Please pray for us all."

"I earnestly ask your prayers for my daughter," writes Mrs. H. A. H. "She was taken to an asylum. Pray that the Lord may heal her and that she may be restored to her right mind."

Mrs. B. D. writes: "I wish to try to express to you my thanks for the prayers you offered in behalf of my little afflicted daughter. She suffered for six long weeks and it was almost a relief when the dear Father called her home, where there will be no more sorrow and pain. There is a vacant place in our home that no one else can fill; but we wish to beg you to join with us in asking God to help us all to so live that we may meet little Pearl in a better world by and by, and that her brothers and sisters may all accept Christ as their Saviour."

"Will the members please pray for a girl who is almost completely blind? Her case is beyond medical aid, and so often I have read where God had honored the prayers of faith, and I always notice when blindness is mentioned in particular. Please pray for her." R. R. I., Canada.

"Pray that God may touch the hearts of a man and his wife who are trying to wrong an old lady."

"I am entering upon my first year as a primary teacher. There are many difficulties in the way. May I not have the prayers of the League that I may be successful in my work, and that my influence as a Christian may lead others to seek the Way?" E. D.

"With deep sorrow I write for an interest in your prayers at the noon hour, for a dear daughter who has recently lost her reason through nervous breakdown. Pray that if it be His will, she may be restored to health, and a sound mind." Mrs. M. C.

"Please pray for my brother that he may become a Christian, and that we may have a revival at Chaplin, Conn." Miss I. H. D.

A contributor to one of our funds writes: "Please pray for the giver, a lone old man, 82 years old, living on a Western ranch."

R. B. asks the members of the Prayer League to pray earnestly for a revival in the Methodist Episcopal Church at Winchester, Ill.

Among the general requests submitted to the Prayer League are the following: for healing, 120; spiritual advancement, 12; reunion, 9; guidance, 11; conversion of relatives and friends, 87; faith, 14; peace, 9; heart's desire 41; forgiveness, 10; wisdom, 12; success 8; financial advancement, 10; blessing, 18.

D. M. Shafer, Decatur, Texas, acknowledges answered prayer and adds: "Please pray that the spiritual life of Ascension Mission may be deepened, and that their work may be a blessing to those who give and to those who receive."

Miss E. G. N., Jeromeville, O., writes: "Sometime ago I wrote you asking you to pray for the success of a coming revival service. Your prayers have been answered: 32 were converted, for which we give God the glory."

We have also received acknowledgments from Mrs. O. W. D., Mrs. R. W., Mrs. P. T. B., Mrs. J. D. M., Miss E. J. W., Mrs. H. W., Mrs. S. H. and C. R. A.

How Can We Improve Our Recreations?

E. L., C. E., and B. Y. P. U. 1 Cor. 10: 23

ALL things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient." These are the words of Paul in our reference. Read the verses that follow this phrase down to the end of the chapter. The gist of the references are that we should so guide our own movements so as not to make ourselves stumbling blocks to others. We may have personal liberty but that does not mean that we have license. Paul says: "Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God."

Our recreations may be harmless in so far as we are concerned, or we may think they are harmless to us, nevertheless society requires that we abstain from that which is setting a bad example to others, who, indulging in these recreations, may suffer much in consequence. And recreations that are not good for everybody, certainly are not good for anybody. That is the test and that is the only test. If we would not willingly injure the characters of others, we should guard against the danger of unwillingly doing that very thing.

What is the solution to the amusement question? What is the one infallible guide in this work of improving our recreations? The answer is Jesus Christ. Jesus went everywhere, but He went everywhere as Jesus. If he cannot enter into the fellowship of the recreations of others, as Christian men and women, we have no right to enter into those fellowships at all, if we wish to be regarded and respected as Christian men and women. We have a Name to honor, ideals to protect, standards to maintain, a certain kind of life to keep unsmirched and unsullied. The Church, the Christ whom the Church represents, is not at warfare against recreation. But it does have a quarrel with the kind of recreation that is offered. There is a vast difference between innocent, healthy, sane, normal relaxation and that which is very much akin to the suggestive, salacious, unhealthy dissipation. This demands a consideration of the place, company, and auspices under which a "good time" is offered. The question for those who have been invited to take part is "Who is responsible for this and where is it going to take place and who is going to be there and what is the program?"

Our recreations will be improved when we ask ourselves whether we can invite our best friends and loved ones, the people whom we respect and whose opinion we honor, to accompany us in some pastime or fun. Would we care to invite the Lord Jesus to go with us? If not, then we certainly have no right to go ourselves.

for every execution, and as the government held many prisoners liable to the death penalty and evidenced a determination to carry out executions, the continuation of bitter warfare seemed inevitable.

Some of the hostile encounters assumed battle proportions, the Sinn Feiners engaged numbering as many as 200 and the fighting lasting for six hours. The Sinn Feiners were armed with service rifles, shotguns, revolvers and bombs, so that they were able to make formidable attacks, and their numbers were sufficient to permit ambushes by day. They were the aggressors in most cases, attacking police patrols on their rounds; but the police were not passive and six Sinn Feiners were killed in a round-up of wanted men near Blarney, County Cork, while the casualties in the other encounters were about evenly divided.

Premier Lloyd George announced in the House of Commons that arrangements were being made for holding elections in May for the North and South Parliaments in Ireland under the Home Rule act. He reiterated his willingness to negotiate with responsible Irish leaders, but declared it was futile to discuss conciliation under present conditions. His statement was in reply to a criticism of the government's policy by former Premier Asquith.

GREEKS BEGIN DRIVE AGAINST TURKS. Greek troops numbering 120,000 have started an offensive against the Turkish Nationalists in Asia Minor, with the Bagdad Railroad as their objective. The Turkish strength was estimated at 90,000 but their supplies were inferior to those of the Greeks, who had made careful preparations for the attack. The Turks fought hard, but were not able to prevent a Greek advance over a considerable area.

TWO AMERICANS CONVICTED IN GERMANY. Two Americans who attempted to seize Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, convicted American slacker, in Germany were convicted by a German court and sentenced to jail terms of six and fifteen months. Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities.—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities.—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds.—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing.—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More.—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds.—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6½ per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107½ per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent. are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co. 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

The Prohibition Movement in Italy

area by constraint would be an assault upon one of the great and venerable sources of Italian wealth. Prohibitionists, few in number as they are and going under the unattractive title of anti-alcoholists, do not for their part attempt to gainsay that assertion. They are content to point out that while Italy, for climatic, geographical and geological considerations, must remain a great producer of grapes, it is only for incidental and unfortunate reasons that Italy should be the greatest wine consumer in Europe—and that means the world.

What are the facts? There are 222 thousand public dispensaries of alcoholic drinks in Italy, an average for the nation of one wine shop to every 150 inhabitants. Populous centers like Milan and Venice show averages of one shop to every fifty inhabitants. In terms of New York life, that would mean a saloon for every apartment house. This is, economically speaking, and only in economic terms are the prohibitionists or rather the limitationists of Italy speaking, is a shocking situation. It is apparent that no people can be permanently solvent which offers such facile leakage to the savings of its producing classes.

ITALY, which has in her time produced a Dante, a Michael Angelo, a Garibaldi and a Caruso, without ever producing a Bryan, seems at last on the point of supplying that deficiency. Italian economists, at their wits' end in dealing with the food shortage, and seeing no relief save in an attack upon the strong box of wine treasure, are more and more advocating the adaptation of grapes to food purposes, whether in the form of grape juice or in that of jam. They hope to accomplish this reform not by restricting the cultivation of vineyards, but by limiting the amount of grapes that may be devoted to fermentation.

Milk has been selling in Rome at one lira eighty centimes a quart, thirty cents normal exchange. What this means for the future health of the nation economists and social workers know only too well. It means national underfeeding for the children of Italy. Chemists are advocating a wide adoption of grape juice as a substitute for milk, where milk is not easily attainable. They point out that in caloric values grape juice may be manufactured which corresponds with milk in a ratio of 58 to 40, being richer than milk in sugar, proteins, phosphates and bone-building substances and slightly poorer only in fats.

Efforts to extend the use of grape foods, especially of grape juice as a substitute for milk, really antedate the war. The "U. V. A.," the Union Viticola Anacolica, which is the principal Italian prohibitionist organization, was founded in 1913, its principal line of propaganda being not to contend with a traditional national fondness for wine, but to utilize the food value of the grape. At that time, the problem of alcoholism was almost exclusively a problem of Northern and Central Italy. The south of Italy has always been "sober," even in relation to the lightest wines. Agitators at that time met almost insuperable obstacles. Not only were they opposed by the interests involved and by national habits of mind, but most important of all by the apathy of the public toward alcoholic excesses. Drunkenness has never been characteristic of a country of light wines in the same visible and disgusting forms that feature the nations where stronger drinks are common. The use of liquors of high alcohol percentages, though it increased at the time of the worst ravages of the filoxera, never became general. It can not be said that the agitation against wine consumption ever attained the dignity of a movement.

The war has changed this situation curiously. The high prices of wine—a dollar as against a former lira a quart—have resulted in less consumption of wine by the salaried classes—professional men, government employees, people living on income, etc.—while wage earners have been drinking more and more.

This has injected the question of alcohol into the class struggle, bringing the economic phases of wine consumption into the political foreground.

THE question may be stated thus: Can Italy afford to spend a billion lire abroad for the grain it does not produce, while continuing to devote one-quarter of its agricultural energy to the production of wine, which is really an article of luxury?

The so-called middle classes, whom the socialists and proletarian parties are anxious to saddle with the burden of taxation, are not willing to assume this billion lire obligation, while leaving untouched the supply of wine which they have in general ceased to drink.

Prohibitionism, of one form or another, has thus found an economic basis in the interests of the Italian middle classes.

Meanwhile the socialists themselves, though hardly as yet daring to broach the question of wine restrictions to the populace which is drinking more than ever or even for the first time, are nevertheless aware of the economic difficulties which some form of liquor control would help to solve.

It is quite possible that a manner of thinking which would never have made its way in Italy on a basis of morals or hygiene, may become prevalent in the name of national finance.

All parties, at any rate, participated in the Anti-Alcoholic Congress, so called, which met in Italy recently. The program discussed at this congress was one of restrictions upon unlimited production of wine; and various proposals are before the public and are being discussed in the press whereby a certain larger portion of the grapes of Italy will be turned by law into food supplies to help replenish the dwindling larder of the nation.

THE third convention of the Christian Fundamentalists will be held in Denver, Colo., from June 12 to 19, and the program this year will continue the work begun at Philadelphia two years ago and augmented at Chicago last year. Dr. W. B. Riley, of Minneapolis, chairman of the World Committee on Conferences, already has held a meeting with fifty-four ministers and laymen in Denver and has received pledges of their moral and financial support in making the convention a success.

Dr. P. V. Jenness, chairman of the program committee, has indicated the following line of topics for the 1921 convention: The Relation of Christian Fundamentals to Sunday School Instruction, to College Training, to Theological Training, to Church Work, to Evangelism, to Religious Literature, to Social Service, and to World Missions. The literature produced will be published and will provide a program of procedure for orthodoxy. A layman's hour, daily, will be an interesting feature of the convention.

Whole Wheat, steam exploded with all its 16 elements fitted to digest Whole Milk—a complete food with vitamins

The One Food That never a child should miss

There is one Puffed Grain of supreme importance—that's Puffed Wheat.

It is whole wheat puffed to bubbles, eight times normal size. Over 100 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel. Thus every granule of this matchless food is fitted to digest.

Every food element here

All the 16 elements growing children need are stored in the whole-wheat kernel. Prof. Anderson's method makes them all available.

Every food cell is blasted. Digestion is made easy and complete. The milk adds vitamins. So these bubble grains in a bowl of milk form the greatest food that a child can get. Many a child who doesn't get it is in some way underfed.

Questions and Answers

READER. The passage in Gen. 2:7—"and man became a living soul,"—has been much discussed, and commentators point out that the act of the Creator indicates something different from the conferring of mere organic life, as was done in the inferior orders of Creation. One authority writes that the language of Genesis "is designed to intimate that the newly formed body of man was simultaneously animated by an intelligent, immaterial, immortal spirit, this being the gift of God and partaking of the immortality of its Divine Author." The Jewish writings, in one instance at least, render the words "and Adam was made a rational soul." The Church has always differed on the interpretation of the passage under discussion, and it involves a point on which no one has the right to dogmatize. With regard to the two trees, the "tree of knowledge of good and evil" was designed as a test of obedience, while the "tree of life," one commentator writes, "was a sacramental tree, by eating of whose fruit man in his state of innocence kept himself in covenant with God." Hebrew writers have held that it was also placed there for perpetuating physical life and conferring bodily health, thus giving assurance of indefinite longevity. All of those deductions are more or less speculative. The story in Genesis has had a multitude of interpreters, few of them in entire agreement. Your other questions are in large measure controversial. See Ezek. 18:4; Luke 12:4, 5; Rom. 5:19; I Tim. 1:17; 6:16; Rom. 6:23; I Tim. 6:16; II Tim. 1:10.

Reader, Sheldon, Ia. We are told to forgive our enemies, not to quarrel with others, and not to go to law with one another. The person who is constantly litigating with his neighbors, or with anyone, is forgetting such injunctions. These are cases where the power of the law must necessarily be invoked, but these would be comparatively rare, if the Gospel counsel were more widely observed.

J. L. B., Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "I note the letter of G., Leidey, Okla., in your Feb. issue. I wonder if my brief story can help him. In 1901 a friend, who was at that time a member of the State Senate of Nebraska, was asked to father a bill for a 'Traveling Library,' so that those residing in remote districts might have the use of good books. The bill became a law and under the management of the Woman's club, for many years, books of merit and interest have been traveling up and down, and across, the great State of Nebraska. Some responsible person takes charge of the books, when they arrive, and they are loaned from house to house, and from farm to farm, and later returned to the librarian; and again sent on to other towns and villages. At present there are thirty of these libraries, of forty volumes each, going up and down the State. Nebraska has the lowest per cent. of illiteracy of any state in the Union. In that same year (1901) the hands of my friend were folded in quiet, but the law creating this Library Commission will remain a fitting memorial to a busy man who took time to remember others."

Professor James Breasted, Director of the Haskell Oriental Museum, University of Chicago, writes us with reference to an article which appeared in the Christian Herald of December 11, relative to the results of recent archaeological discoveries in Mesopotamia and Babylonia. The statements in the Christian Herald were mainly reproduced from articles in the daily newspapers recording the discoveries. The Professor's letter says: "It has been called to my attention that in a recent number of your journal you have published an announcement of my discovery of 'the record of the miraculous destruction of the Assyrian army before Jerusalem, in the days of Hezekiah, as related in II Kings 19:35.' As this statement is in serious disagreement with the facts, may I ask that a statement of the real character of our monument be published in your columns? It is true that we now have in our collections at the University of Chicago a six-sided prism, giving an account of Sennacherib's western campaigns, including the one on which, in accordance with the Biblical narratives, he lost his army. It is a partial duplicate of the Taylor cylinder now in the British Museum. It is an extensive document, and we have not yet been able to make the necessary comparison and determine the value of the variants. It does not contain any statement of the miraculous destruction of the Assyrian army before Jerusalem; and there is nothing in it that is not in harmony with the usually accepted modern critical conclusions regarding Hebrew history." We gladly give space to the Professor's letter and indulge the hope that when the cylindrical document is fully examined, we may be privileged to announce through the Christian Herald what it actually states concerning Hebrew history.

DENTAL PLATE BRUSH

THE difference between only partly cleaned and thoroughly cleaned artificial teeth is exactly the difference between a common tooth brush and the Pro-phy-lac-tic Dental Plate Brush.

Study the illustration in front of you. Note the long tuft of extra-stiff, unbleached bristles separated from the body of the brush. This tuft reaches around so easily that it readily and completely cleanses the deepest recesses of any style or size of dental plate.

The Pro-phy-lac-tic Dental Plate Brush is the creation of the makers of the famous Pro-phy-lac-tic Tooth Brush for natural teeth. Look for the name, Pro-phy-lac-tic Dental Plate Brush, on the handle. Always sold in the Yellow Box.

Those who use or are about to use artificial teeth will be interested in our booklet "How to Care for Artificial Teeth." It gives practical advice on their use as well as their care. It tells how to become quickly accustomed to them and use them in a natural manner—and many useful hints that will be of great service.

Springtime in Japan

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

*OUT where the river,
Meets the bay,
The cherry blossoms
Dip and sway—
And, as they dip and sway,
They sing,
Of poetry, and love,
And spring!*

*Like dim shapes passing,
Through a dream,
Gay little boats,
Float down the stream,
They seem much more Than miles away—
They seem a bit,
Of yesterday!*

*Veiled music creeps,
Across the hours—
Or is it just
The cherry flowers?
All life seems painted,
On a fan;
A fantasy,

*Out where the river,
Meets the bay,
All hearts, I think,
Are glad today—
For, oh, the blossoms
Softly sing,
Of poetry, and love,
And spring!*

The tired boatman paused to feast,
His beauty-loving eyes.*

And sweet contentment filled his heart,
And Peace was ruler there!*

Great happiness may be—
If one has but the soul to know,
And eyes that really see!*

GRAHAM PATTERSON, PUBLISHER

Woodrow Wilson—Private Citizen

WOODROW WILSON'S decision to live in Washington, even though his term as President of the United States is at an end, was based on a desire to be close to what is going on nationally and internationally. In forming a law partnership with his one-time Secretary of State, Bainbridge Colby, with offices in Washington as well as New York City, he wished to continue in intimate contact with those responsible for future American policies.

This much—and very little more—is known to the new group of public men who have just assumed the direction of American affairs. They are turning their heads from time to time in the direction of the Wilson residence, an unpretentious red brick house in S street, to watch developments. They are sure developments are going to come. Mr. Wilson, they accept, is by no means through with public issues.

Mr. Wilson quit the Presidency, broken in health, defeated in aspirations and, to the world at large, a fallen idol. After twenty months of serious illness he is slowly regaining his health, increasing his activity day by day. Whether he will ever be able to recover his popularity and again become a really influential factor in public affairs is the question over which Republicans and Democrats are pondering.

Theodore Roosevelt wielded a tremendous force after he retired from the Presidency; William H. Taft, it generally is agreed, is more popular today than at the time he left the White House. The course that Mr. Wilson will follow, in the very thick of the consideration of public questions, will be just as interesting as it may be far-reaching.

In the back of Mr. Wilson's head still lurks a determination to obtain participation by the United States in the League of Nations. Without doubt he is the chief American champion of the Treaty of Versailles. His closest friends admit that he is quietly awaiting a time when he will try, with some hope of success, to obtain its reconsideration by the United States.

Historians in years to come will better analyze the reasons for the rise of Mr. Wilson's popularity and its subsequent collapse, but a consideration even now of the chief elements is interesting in that they reveal the mental attitude with which he retired from the Presidency.

Mr. Wilson, hale and hearty, entered the White House in March, 1913, with a glow of confidence, his mind centered on domestic problems, chiefly currency reform and tariff revision. Foreign affairs at the time held a secondary place in popular concern, and Mr. Wilson's experience with them had been that of a critical historian.

THE European war began eighteen months after he assumed the Presidency, after virtually the entire program of domestic readjustment had been completed. Mr. Wilson devoted himself almost entirely, therefore, to foreign matters, following in detail the developments on the battle fronts and in the foreign offices of the belligerents.

Something occurred in January, 1914, six months before the European war began, which shed much light upon the inner workings of Mr. Wilson's mind. In a speech he delivered in Indianapolis, celebrating Jackson Day, Mr. Wilson took occasion to defend his much-criticized Mexican policy with the assertion that he cared not what

By No Means Through with Public Issues,
He Is Well Worth Watching

By DONALD MACGREGOR

The contrast of eight years—Woodrow Wilson as he appeared at the first cabinet meeting in 1913 and at the last in 1921 the newspapers said about him. He would be content, he added, to be judged in history. It seemed natural that Mr. Wilson should take such a view, since he himself had been a writer of history.

Many times in Washington during the critical periods that followed the outbreak of the European war it was apparent to the correspondents and others that Mr. Wilson was being guided by a realization of the historical aftermath. At first—so it seemed at the time and does yet, for that matter—Mr. Wilson saw an opportunity to go down in history as a great peacemaker. Those who followed the developments believed this to be the purpose, the secondary purpose, perhaps, of his famous appeal for national neutrality in the early days of the war and his persistent efforts to keep the United States out of the war, even when America suffered from violations of international law.

IN RETAINING such a feeling Mr. Wilson did not necessarily open himself to criticism. Guided even by personal considerations, if such he was, it did not mean that the better interests of the United States had to be sacrificed. What might have put Mr. Wilson down in history as a great man might at the same time have been precisely the thing that would be beneficial to the United States. The danger mark came only if Mr. Wilson attempted to carry this personal idea too far. It still is, of course, a debated question as to whether he did this when, at the Paris peace conference, he pledged American membership in the League of Nations.

At any rate those who watched Mr. Wilson's course with the idea in mind that all the time he was thinking of what would be written in history were able to justify the later developments with their theory. They saw Mr. Wilson, after the Central Powers had violated many rules of international law even to the extent of open warfare on the United States, wondering if history would put him down as a man too much afraid to go to war, "too proud to fight," perhaps. There was but one answer. Deciding he would not go down in history as a coward, he became determined to become a great warrior and a great peacemaker as well. Throwing every ounce of American energy into the conflict, he would end the European war and then, at the peace table, write the peace, if possible.

The circumstances of the entry of the United States into the war are too well known to need retelling; the story of how the war was won seven months after the American troops joined the forces of the Allies is fresh in every mind; public memory does not need to be jogged about Mr. Wilson's trip to Europe for the peace conference and how, when he got there, the people of every land acclaimed him as a great leader, some of them as a God-send savior of the day.

Then came the reaction and finally the crash. The Senate refused to accept the Treaty of Versailles as Mr. Wilson brought it back from France, a course which the people of the country approved by an overwhelming vote in the "solemn referendum" of last November. Meantime Mr. Wilson, touring the West in advocacy of the League of Nations, suffered a physical breakdown that barred him from participation in public affairs.

SO CAME March 4, 1921, when Mr. Wilson surrendered the Presidency to Warren G. Harding. He retired bent, gray and feeble, leaning heavily on a cane and walking with a limp, very slowly. But he held the same fighting spirit he had in the days of the treaty consideration, and he showed it in his attitude toward the opposition senators on Inauguration Day.

As a private citizen Mr. Wilson presents to both Republicans and Democrats considerable of a question. The Republicans, naturally, want to know who they will have to fight and the issues; the Democrats want to know whether

In the rear of Mr. Wilson's new Washington home is a beautiful court where he can enjoy sun baths and exercise in privacy

Mr. Wilson is through as a party leader or whether he will continue to crack the Democratic whip and compel them to follow his commands.

It is recognized generally that Mr. Wilson still has his friends, countless thousands of friends all over the United States and Europe. Open evidence of this has been the great quantity of letters that the one-time President continually receives; there are throughout the country a vast number of firm exponents of the League of Nations just as there are vast numbers who are determined in their opposition.

President Harding's success with the new American foreign policy he and his associates are working out will be one of the keys to Mr. Wilson's future activity, yet it is doubted by those who deal with such affairs whether any scheme which is decided on, association of nations or otherwise, will meet the approval of Mr. Wilson. He is anxious about the way he is going to go down in history; he is seeking to be vindicated in the foreign policies to which he pledged the United States. Those who know Mr. Wilson's mind declare that in no circumstances will he surrender.

Much of Mr. Wilson's future in public affairs will depend, of course, upon his condition of health. His

The Pedlers of the Twilight

By ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

*THE winds of dusk from sunset hills retreat
And steal through valleys to the hamlets still;
In gardens old, rose-haunted, dim, they fill
Their packs with perfumes, blossom-sweet;
Then down the roads of earth on shadow feet
They go, by murmuring river and by rill
To citied plains, to peopled vale and hill,
To scatter beauty down each careless street.*

*A mother smiles, recalling love's first day;
A lover dreams of one fair as a rose;
And one with pain gray-eyed sinks back to rest;
An exile pauses in a crowded way
And sees again a homeland garden-close—
The twilight winds are busy on their quest!*

present gradual improvement, the physicians who have an intimate knowledge of the case agree, probably will continue so as to permit a much more active participation in national issues than is possible at present. Mr. Wilson is but sixty-five, an age when many men are vigorous. Yet the nature of his illness—due to a paralytic stroke—is apt to prevent him from ever taking the stump again or to permit more than general conferences and the issuance of statements.

MEANTIME Mr. Wilson is sitting quietly in the new house in S street, in a room overlooking Rock Creek Park, a magnificent wilderness within a city. Once a day he goes for an automobile ride. Now and then he is the host to some friends he knew in the White House.

Mr. Wilson has not relinquished the leadership of the Democratic party. He is today its most conspicuous and influential figure. Whether he will continue so will depend upon developments. He presents one of the vital questions of the political situation today so far as personalities are concerned. And personalities, to a large extent—almost entirely so with Mr. Wilson—guide policies.

Mr. Wilson is an uncertain quantity for both the Republicans and Democrats. That is why they are both watching.

The Quadricentennial of Luther at Worms.

THE 18th of April, 1921, will be the 400th anniversary of Luther's famous stand at Worms—an act which more than any other perhaps in history has challenged the interest and admiration of mankind. The powerful forces arrayed against him, the vital importance of the questions involved; and the unflinching courage of the chief actor, make it unrivalled in importance and fascination.

The dearest interests of mankind were on that fateful day trembling in the balance. These opposing forces, crystallized into Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, are still living issues. Protestantism, there born, has become the leading religious power in the most enlightened nations. And as it and Romanism are still dividing the church of Christ, it is of utmost value that Christians recall the scene, re-study the issues, and form clear and definite convictions respecting them.

These had been gradually assuming a definite form. While the world was sleeping, and the dominance of the powerful Romish ecclesiastical organization never seemed more firmly entrenched, a modest pious monk, gifted with a keen intellect, and a remarkable religious inspiration, had been carefully studying the gospel teachings of Christ and St. Paul's interpretation of Christianity. Looking out from his monastery upon the ecclesiastical world, and confronted by the traffic which Tetzel was carrying on in Indulgences under Papal authority, he was convinced that the gospel teachings were thereby vitiated to the delusion of the people and the hurt of souls.

Hence, October 31, 1517, he nailed his 95 theses against indulgences as a means of remitting sin, on the doors of the Cathedral at Wittenberg. No one was more surprised than Luther when these theses "flew everywhere throughout Europe, as though the angels of God had been their messengers." From that generative act, developments hurried quickly. Pope Leo X, at first disregarded Luther, but warned by Erasmus, the Papal Legate and others, of Luther's piety, ability, and large following, he determined to avert the danger by issuing a Bull of Excommunication. This was so severe that it would have crushed an ordinary protestant. But Luther was of a different quality. At the head of a procession of students, he committed the Bull to the flames in the Wittenberg Square. This bold, dramatic act rallied so many to his side that it was impossible to carry the Bull into effect. And so Luther was summoned to make answer before an ecclesiastical Diet at Worms.

THE issues in brief were: Papal Indulgences; or true repentance, as the means of the forgiveness of sins. The authority of the Pope, and the Infallibility of Ecclesiastical Councils; or the supreme authority of the Word of God. The power to interpret the Scriptures; whether pertaining to the Church, or the prerogative of the conscience. The liberty of the individual; or the absolute sovereignty of Pope and Councils. The spirituality of religion; or its essence in masses, satisfactions and outward works. The simplicity of public worship; to be conducted not in an unknown Latin tongue, but in the language of the common people, Christian Liberty more vital than an east-iron visible unity.

The Diet was staged in the most august style, so as, by the tremendous display of force, to reduce the rebellious monk to submission. Charles the Fifth, the youthful Emperor, sat upon a throne, surrounded by the Papal Legate, Cardinals, Archbishops, Princes, Electors and Generals, and the hall was crowded by a vast multitude.

Luther had been greatly encouraged by the crowds who gathered to cheer him, as he passed through the various cities on his journey. Warned that his safe conduct would be violated, as the Emperor Sigismund's to Huss at the Diet of Constance had been, he made the dauntless reply: "Though there be as many devils in Worms as there are tiles on the roofs of the houses, yet will I go thither." As he entered the hall, there was a great stir to see the monk who had caused such a world commotion.

Summoned to the platform prepared for him, he saw a pile of his books, whose titles were read, and which he was asked to retract. D'Aubigny, in his "History of the Reformation," says that Luther "made answer in a low and humble voice, without any vehemence, but with gentleness and mildness and in a manner full of respect and diffidence, yet with much joy and Christian firmness." He began: "Most serene Emperor and illustrious Princes and gracious Lords: I this day appear before you in all humility according to your command, and I implore your Majesty and your August Highness to listen with favor to the defense of a cause, which I am well assured is just and right. I ask pardon if, by reason of my ignorance, I am wanting in the manners that befit a court, for I have not been brought up in kings' palaces, but in the seclusion of a cloister." He then proceeded to detail the corrupt teachings and practices which had become current in the church, befouling her courts, contradicting the simple faith of the gospel, and misleading the souls of the people.

WHEN Luther closed, the Emperor who did not like German, asked him to repeat his defence in Latin. Luther, exhausted by his effort before so splendid an assembly, says, "I was bathed in sweat, and standing in the center of the princes." But having taken a few minutes' breathing spell, he repeated his address in Latin with undiminished power. The Chancellor then addressed him: "You are not to question the decisions of the Councils; you are required to return a distinct answer: Will you, or will you not retract?" To this Luther promptly made reply: "I cannot submit my faith to the Pope or Councils, because it is as clear as noonday that they have fallen into error, and even into glaring contradictions of themselves. If then, I am not convinced by proof from Holy Scripture, or by cogent reasons, I neither can nor will retract anything, for it is neither right nor safe for a Christian to sin against his conscience."

This positive refusal and the eloquence and power of Luther overawed the great assembly. The Emperor at once arose and dissolved the Diet. There was a great confusion and uproar of angry disputants, in the midst of which Luther rushed to the front of the platform, and in a loud voice heard above the din, uttered the immortal words: "Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise, God help me, Amen!" As Luther passed out, he held up his hands and cried joyously: "I am through! I am through!" His friends, and especially the great Elector Frederick who had taken him under protection, crowded about to congratulate him, proud of his splendid defense, and of the favorable impression he had made. He left Worms indeed the conqueror.

That memorable day and answer, were the birth of the Reformation. That the movement succeeded, when every previous reform had failed, was owing, under God, to the wise and wonderful leadership of Luther. His personality was a marvelously composite one. Heine said that he combined qualities generally considered irreconcilable. He was a theologian and a statesman; a severe student and lively and humorous in society; the foremost preacher; a translator of the Scriptures and a hymnologist; a terrible champion in battle, yet gentle and tender in the home, loving the play of little children about him; firmly orthodox, yet a lover of the mystic writers; fond of the fine arts and of music, relieving his wearing studies by singing to his lute beneath the stars. No wonder that so great, wise and indomitable a leader became the giant founder of Protestantism, the author of civil and religious liberty; and the creator of the modern age.

When Buddhist Nuns Read "Buffalo Bill"

The Ninth Article in a Series on "New Worlds"

By WILLARD PRICE

No wonder this Korean looks pleased. Who would not prefer a medical missionary with stethoscope to a native doctor with red-hot needles

"HOW did you like America?"

An American put the question to a Korean student who had just returned to the Land of the Morning Calm from a visit to the United States.

"Not very much," answered the young man. "You see, America hasn't anything fit to eat, and has many abominable customs, such as eating with a knife and fork, while the language sounded to me like the twittering of sparrows and the chattering of magpies."

"But were you not impressed with our great cities, like New York and Chicago?"

"Oh, yes," with a condescending nod, "as cities go. They are big, but the streets of New York smell horribly, while Chicago was so noisy, I thought I would go deaf."

He was glad to get home to Korea. But even this joy was disturbed by the fact that he did not find Korea as peaceful as it had been when he left.

For even this "hermit country" is fast losing its identity as the Land of the Morning Calm, and is becoming the Land of the Noon-Day Glare. The sun of civilization, with its fierce power for good and evil, is beating down upon it, warming it into life in some places, scorching it to a dead crisp in others.

IN SEARCH of the old Korea, I asked a native friend to take me to some part of the country still untouched by modernism. Leaving car tracks and asphalt behind, we struck off into the interior.

One night we spent in a Buddhist nunnery in the heart of a forest. It seemed certain that no modern influence could ever have penetrated here.

Hospitably received by a sister whose name sounded like "Doublechin," we left our shoes at the door, padded about in our stocking feet, sat on our heels on the floor, and presently our supper was brought in on a tray and set on the floor between us.

We took our chopsticks and went to work. Those who have never tried to eat a man-size meal with chopsticks do not know what real work is.

The meal consisted of rice and seven kinds of pickles—pickled mushrooms, pickled seaweed, pickled cabbage, pickled spinach, pickled beans, pickled pine nuts, pickled millet seeds and pickled maple leaves. Also a little fried seaweed, blistered until it looked like alligator skin, was put before us as a special delicacy.

No meats. The Buddhist nuns were strict vegetarians. An animal, they believed, might be a reincarnated ancestor, and it would be a terrible thing inadvertently to devour an ancestor.

No spoons, no knives, no forks, no napkins, no table or chairs, no glass windows, no pictures of Warren G. Harding on the wall, no newspaper, no telephone, no phonograph—nothing, apparently, that was western or modern. Surely, I thought, we had come to the right place to find primitive Korean life.

After supper we were shown to our sleeping-room—

I can hardly call it a bedroom, for there was no bed in it. The room was simply furnished, to put it mildly. Absolutely the only furnishings consisted of some wooden blocks lying on the stone floor. My Korean friend explained that these blocks were pillows. The Korean sleeps on a stone floor, without blankets or padding of any kind, with a block of wood under the back of his neck, his head lopping over. This is the Korean's idea of comfort. To the Westerner, it is decidedly solid comfort.

With the hip-bruising satisfaction that I had at last discovered a spot in the world never invaded by modern notions, I finally fell asleep. About midnight I was awakened by a glare of light. The paper door had fallen open a little and a light was shining in.

There, across the narrow court, was Sister "Doublechin," hunched up, reading a modern book by the light of a modern coal-oil lamp!

I nudged my Korean companion.

"What's she reading?" I asked.

He peered across at the large Korean symbol on the paper cover of the book.

"It's Buffalo Bill," he said. "Our Korean translation."

"Where did she get that lamp?"

"That's the lamp the Standard Oil Company sells over here for eight cents," he replied. "And it's Standard Oil she's burning in it."

And there she sat, a Buddhist nun in the heart of primitive Korea, where you sleep on a stone floor with a wooden block for a pillow, and can't eat meat for fear of eating an ancestor—there she was reading an American thriller by the light of Standard Oil!

THERE is scarcely a territorial pie left in the world into which the Western Jack Horner has not stuck in his thumb and pulled out his financial plum.

The first electric car line in the capital of Korea was built by an American. The long-skirted conductors on the cars use coin registers made in Chicago.

When this trolley line was first put into operation, a drought occurred. The sky blazed and the earth rolled up clouds of dust. Day followed day with no sign of rain, and the paddy fields were parched.

What could be the trouble? Farmers flocked to the geomancers and ground-prophets. The answer of these seers was: "The devil that runs the thunder and lightning wagons has caused the drought."

Mobs attacked the trolley cars, rolled one over, set fire to another and exploded the tracks. Soon after this, rain fell, and men smiled at each other, well satisfied that they had given the trolley-devil a terrible fright.

The American who introduced the trolley went on to build the first fine road in Korea, over which American motoreycles speed today. He also built the first railway. All the glass in the first railway coaches was soon broken by excited passengers thrusting out their heads without first raising the window. The Koreans knew nothing of glass. A material so invisible that one could see through it, and yet so solid that it would bruise one's head, was beyond their comprehension.

Finally the same expedient which had been adopted in near-by Japan was adopted. A white strip was painted at eye-level across each window in order that the Korean might have a constant reminder of the reality of the unseen! It was effective for glass and passengers.

A MORE serious difficulty was the propensity of Koreans for lying down between the tracks at night. Since the stone road-bed was exactly as comfortable as the Korean stone bed, and the iron rail was the exact height and width of the Korean pillow, travelers on warm summer evenings would save the cost of a room at the inn and would drop down on this luxurious outdoor couch to spend the night. They knew that trains rarely ran at night. But occasionally a special would be sent out, and the task of the engineer was a harrowing one as he peered anxiously ahead, watching for a white form across the track and a head lopping backward over the rail. The bell must be kept going and the whistle blowing lustily to awaken the slumberers, who would sit up and rub their eyes in the glare of the headlights, while the train, with grinding brakes, came to a heavy stop within a few yards of them.

Sometimes the slumberer did not awake and the train could not stop. Several decapitations were reported to the authorities before the Koreans decided that track-sleeping, although a very delicious and tempting luxury, was on the whole imprudent.

There are more than a thousand miles of railroad in Korea today. Along the main line the natives are now quite accustomed to the devil-carriages. On every trip hundreds of Korean men, all lit up in their white or baby-blue gowns and fly-trap hats tied daintily under the chin, board cars made in Wilmington, Delaware, drawn by a locomotive made in Philadelphia over steel rails from South Chicago, loll in the first-class carriages, wield their knives and forks in the diner, eat American ice-cream, and look out with blasé air upon the forty-miles-an-hour panorama of scenery as if they had been used to this sort of thing all their lives.

TRAVEL has taught Korea that her old map of the world is out of date—the map which showed Korea as the center of the world surrounded by the kingdom of the Three-Headed People, the Land of Fire-Eaters, the Fork-Tongued People and the Round-Eyed Cyclops Kingdom.

Even the picturesque costume of the Korean is undergoing change. The married man's hat, loosely woven like wire window-screening so that the breezes come and go through it, and one may look into it and see the matrimonial top-knot, is being abandoned in favor of the hotter and less comfortable Western straw.

The modern Korean cuts short his hair. An old-time Korean would consider that quite as serious as cutting one's throat. Many are the superstitions that are coiled in with the top-knot; and to sever the strands is to sever with all the past and bring down the terrible wrath of the many millions of Korea's gods.

The shoes of Korea were either cheap straw sandals which would wear out in a week's time, or immense gondola-shaped wooden shoes, somewhat like the shoes of Holland, but raised up from one to three inches from the ground on cleats of wood. The purpose of this elevation was that the shoes might not get soiled or the feet wet in muddy weather. The leather shoe is now invading the land. Korean young men have found that by tacking metal heel plates not only on the heels but all over the soles of their leather shoes, this footgear will last long enough to be more economical than the perishable straw sandals.

White gowns have been almost universally worn

The Family Altar

IN a recent Two-Day evangelistic meeting the editor of the Christian Herald asked an audience of 1,000 people, mostly church members, to tell him by a show of hands how many of them were brought up in homes where the Family Altar was the custom. Nearly every hand went up. But when the question was asked, "How many of you have a Family Altar in your own homes?" fewer than 50 hands went up out of 1,000 church people.

Is this a fair percentage, true of all church people today? If it is, we have one reason out of others, for the absence of prayer in our churches, the ignorance of the Bible text and the "hit or miss" habits of thousands of families in their home life.

It has been said that one reason for the dropping of family worship out of American home life is due to a reaction from a form of prayer that was more or less unreal and hypocritical. But when one questions the people who were reared in homes where the Altar was a daily custom, one seldom hears any one criticize the way in which it was conducted. Most grown people today recall the old family worship with respect, and regret that it has passed out.

The real reason is twofold: the hurry and irregularity of American homes in which all hours are kept for meals and assembling the whole family together; and the reluctance on the part of the father to assume the place of the priest of the family.

The trouble is that the Family Altar is not started just as soon as the first child is born, or rather, on the very first day of the married life. That is the place to make a beginning. It would be very embarrassing for thousands of good men, members of churches, to say to a family of grown-up children: "We will begin tomorrow morning to have family worship." Very many would not know what to do, and thousands of church members have never prayed aloud in the presence of their own wife and children.

The Christian Herald will welcome letters from its readers on this vital subject. Answer briefly these three questions:

1. Do you have a Family Altar?
 2. How do you conduct it?
 3. Is it possible and necessary in every Home?
- Please send letters direct to the editor.

Spiritual Forces

THE world is waiting for spiritual forces to save it from material defeat. Greed, race feeling, political intrigue, national jealousy, misunderstanding, injustice, hate, ill-will, and selfish passion are powerful forces to destroy material happiness. The Allies and Germany are struggling over the matter of indemnity. Great Britain and Ireland are engaged in a war so bitter and irreconcilable that the term "civil" war is necessary to describe the actual conditions. Russia is an enigma of all the human passions let loose against herself and the rest of mankind. Austria presents the spectacle of a nation holding a Belshazzar feast in a graveyard. China starves to death in the north, and exports shiploads of rare merchandise in the south. The United States spends annually 22 times as much for luxuries as for higher education. Labor and Capital face each other as foes instead of friends. While the people of all countries stagger under war debts that will require three generations to pay, 800,000,000 persons crowd the theaters annually in this country, and churches of 1,000 membership count less than 100 regular attendants once a week at a prayer meeting. Ten million farmers, it is estimated, have abandoned their farms during the last ten years, and thousands of unemployed walk the streets of overcrowded cities and refuse to till the soil at any price.

And over all this stirring of the human passions and weaknesses and frailties of human kind, the average economist, legislator, senator, politician, editor and professional reformer stands bewildered, or at least with no uniform or positive program for betterment or enlightenment. The material world is living in a tremendous crisis and the material man has no salvation to hold out better than material forces blundering along their stupid, ever-defeated course.

It is a good time in the history of this world for the Christian to test his Master's teaching. Jesus said: "Whatsoever ye ask in prayer believing, ye shall receive." He said, "Be of good cheer! I have overcome the world!" If the material forces can not save the material world of politics and industry and international adjustment from material defeat, let spiritual forces perform the miracle.

It looks like an impossible task to settle happily the troubles between Great Britain and Ireland. It looks like a wild dream to think of ill-will disappearing from the Balkans. There are any number of pessimists to tell us that the bitterness between Germany and France can never pass away, and that the German mind will never change or improve. And even members of churches will openly express their doubt as to the possibility of a world brotherhood.

But now is the testing-time of the Christian faith. Have we believed a myth or an impossible ideal all these years? Did Jesus speak a lie when He said He would draw all men to Himself? Is it true that love is going down to defeat before hate? Is it a fact that material forces are superior to spiritual forces?

Pastors and church members of America, the time has come to test the power of spiritual forces! The material forces have failed.

Bring up the Spiritual!

Pray without ceasing!

Exalt Jesus!

And give spiritual forces the right of way!

Let there be less preaching and more praying!

Less oratory and more heart faith!

Break down the formal programs of ecclesiasticism!

Lift up the Cross of the Redeemer!

Hold out the hand of Brotherhood!

Level the false distinctions of race!

And give spiritual forces the right of way to straighten out a crooked and distracted world!

The One Response

THE editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald has had the great privilege during the last six months of meeting audiences of the American people in more than half the states of the Union. He has spoken to all sorts of people in mass meetings on Sunday and week days, in country and city, in educational and industrial centers, and at a safe computation has talked to people of every political and religious faith.

And the one thing which has impressed him is the assurance that the people of this country want disarmament. Every time the subject has been mentioned, even so radically as to having the United States step out alone and lay down her arms, there has been an instant response of approval. Even in churches on Sunday morning, where applause is generally unknown, there has been an instant response. The people have not applauded any speaker, but the sentiment expressed calling for the cessation of war, and the making of war material.

There is no question in the editor's mind that the people of this country want disarmament. A majority of them want it. Counting out the politicians and militarists and the people who live off of the manufacture of war supplies, this country wants to go out of the war business. If the Tax-payer could vote on it today he would vote to disarm.

"Question!" Are you ready for the question? All in favor of disarmament say Aye!

"Aye!" says the American people. The ayes have it. The motion is carried!

Sword or Cross?

WHEN Jesus, in one of His last talks with His disciples, told them that "the Prince of this world cometh, and he hath nothing in me," he uttered a tremendous truth. As the crisis of His earthly ministry was approaching, He clearly foresaw the crowning effort of the powers of evil for His destruction. Soon the divine Head was to be bowed under the shadow of the Cross. The same evil power which had outraged humanity for thousands of years, wrought upon the jealous Jewish priesthood to give Him over to death, and even stirred up the very multitudes who had acclaimed Him as King, to cry for His blood.

That the teaching of Jesus and also of His disciples was opposed to war, can not be successfully questioned by anyone who reads the Gospel record. Yet it has ever been the world's way and also that of the Church to approve war, the latter it is true, with occasional reluctance. But these reluctant episodes were usually short-lived. Ultimately the Church has yielded and "the Prince of this world" had his way. The promise of world-power and dominion which the Saviour rejected has never been turned aside, but has been eagerly grasped by so-called Christian civilization.

These reflections, which have been in the minds of thoughtful Christians during the great world war and the chaos that now follows it, are stimulated anew by a timely little volume, entitled "The Sword or the Cross," just issued by the Christian Century Press, Chicago. It discusses in frank and unbiased terms the question which of the two—Sword or Cross—should be the weapon of the Christian militant. "Shall we use the weapons of violence and bloodshed, or is there a more effective weapon available?" the writer asks. It is a fair question and probably the most urgent one before the Church today. Is there no better use for human beings than to be moved like pawns and sacrificed by thousands to gain a given point? There is no possibility of idealizing war. It can not be refined. It is simply, as Henry Emerson Fosdick has declared, "using the finest qualities in human life to make a hell on earth."

"Six years ago," writes Kirby Page, the author of the book, "it was generally believed that the Church was opposed to war. It was—in theory. It remained so until crowned heads and other rulers made declarations and mobilized their fighting men. Then the Church did what it has consistently done for a thousand years—it flung itself unreservedly into the struggle." "Can it be that the Church has been wrong in holding this attitude toward war?" He is almost inclined to answer in the negative. But although war, at the moment of its inception, may be said to be favored by the majority, the still more searching question arises whether the majority is infallible. Majorities, including the Church and the governments, have opposed and persecuted many of the world's greatest benefactors—men who brought new light to bear on science, men eminent in religion, and in the great movement for human freedom, as well as in needed reforms and in many other lines of world progress. Every student of history knows it; surely the majority is not infallible!

What might have been the history of the last twenty centuries if the Church had consistently opposed war? The writer of this book reminds us again of the teachings of Jesus, many of them still but dimly comprehended or even wholly misunderstood. The "sword," of which He spoke in Matt. 10:34 and Luke 22:36, was to mark the line of division between right and wrong, to make a cleavage, not in the bodies of men, but in the ancient philosophies and age-old customs, and especially in the interpretation of religion. His teachings to His followers, His rejection of the Tempter's lure of worldly greatness and power, His new standard of love and kindness, of forgiveness, of brotherhood, were all against war and bloodshed. His Kingdom was not one of power and possessions and mighty armies and wars. It is, as clearly as His words could express it, a Kingdom in the hearts of men who place love and faith and kindness and mercy above all the prizes of the world, with its fightings and conquests. This was the meaning accepted in the early Church. Has the modern Church wholly forgotten the glorious vision?

We commend this little volume to the careful study of our readers, preferring that they should learn the author's conclusions. It is timely and inspirational.

More Good Signs

IT WAS in one of the largest motion-picture houses in New England. It was full of well-dressed, respectable looking people. They looked like the average audience in an average city church. And most of them had come to see a picture which had been widely advertised as the best and most refined that had ever been made.

But after the regular world-travel pictures had been shown, a vulgar comedy was thrown on the screen, in which religion was travestied and the work of the mission was ridiculed. The audience sat silent and with apparent disapproval.

Following the so-called comedy two people came out on the stage and danced a vulgar dance and recited a still more vulgar dialogue. And again the large audience sat silent and refused to call the actors back. During the war or immediately after it, the same exhibition of vulgarity and irreverence would have been followed by wild applause.

Are the people becoming ashamed of themselves? It begins to look as if some of them were. It would have been better if the entire audience had risen and gone out, after expressing disapproval. But its silence was at least a hint of the fact that the people are beginning to think a little.

The bad film is on trial.

So are the people!

The World News of the Week

Former Emperor Charles Tries to Regain Throne of Hungary

FORMER Emperor Charles, weary of exile, believed his reappearance in Hungary was all that was necessary to start a movement which would restore him to the throne of the Hapsburgs, to which he never has surrendered his claims. Ignoring Allied opposition and the fact that the chief purpose of the Little Entente of Roumania, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia was to prevent such an event, he slipped across the frontier from his refuge in Switzerland and motored by easy stages to Budapest, confident that the population would receive him enthusiastically and rally to his support.

His adventure was regarded by the friends of monarchy as a "great calamity," and the reception of the former monarch was not all according to his expectations, but it caused great agitation among the neighboring governments. On the way to Budapest, Charles met Premier Teleky of Hungary, who attempted vainly to persuade him to leave the country at once. Arriving in Budapest, according to the press accounts, he exchanged his civilian garb for a general's uniform, went to the king's private rooms in the royal palace and summoned Admiral Horthy, the Regent, to his presence. The Admiral, a monarchist, returned word that he was the head of the Hungarian state and no one had a right to send for him, but later he held a three-hour conference with Charles, at which he accepted Hungary's highest military decoration, but declared he would offer armed resistance to any attempt to overthrow his régime. Charles at last consented to leave the country, but halted in West Hungary, where he was surrounded by a court of officers who pledged the army's support. A plea of illness was offered to excuse his stay. Government officials promised he would depart at once, but Charles's adherents asserted he intended to persist in his adventure.

The Little Entente made vigorous representations to Hungary against the restoration of Charles. Roumania and Yugoslavia concentrated strong forces along the Hungarian frontier, ready for armed intervention on short notice. Italy was said to be in thorough accord with the stand of the Little Entente, holding that Charles never would be content with the present boundaries of Hungary, and that he would be certain to attempt to regain the provinces which have been detached from his former empire.

Charles apparently entered upon his adventure without consultation with the men now in control in Austria and Hungary; and many believed his attempted coup had made it impossible that he should ever regain the throne, since it showed an irresponsible character. Showing the extent of the fall of the Hapsburgs was the appearance of Archduke Leopold Ferdinand of Hapsburg-Lothringen in a trashy sketch in a Berlin cabaret at the time his nephew was making his reckless attempt to regain a throne.

Viviani Begins Parleys

RENE VIVIANI, former premier of France, has arrived in America and has presented to President Harding his credentials as envoy extraordinary, but official information regarding the proposals which he will make to the new administration was withheld. His first call at the White House was purely ceremonial and was preceded by a conference of more than an hour with Secretary Hughes in which Ambassador Jusserand and Henry P. Fletcher, under-Secretary of State, also participated. The Ambassador served as interpreter, since M. Viviani does not speak English and Mr. Harding does not speak French.

One point M. Viviani will attempt to convey to President Harding is the belief of French officials that a separate peace between the United States and Germany would so encourage the Germans that they would seek in every way possible to evade their obligations under the Versailles Treaty, and that the entire withdrawal of the United States from the post-war settlements might lead to the collapse of Europe. If a separate peace should be made he would ask that it be accompanied by a declaration of American support of the insistence of the Allies that Germany live up to her Treaty obligations.

At a conference between the President and Senator Lodge it was decided to place the adoption of Senator Knox's resolution for a separate peace on the program for the coming extra session of Congress. Some declaration placing the United States on record as upholding the Allied efforts to enforce the Versailles Treaty is to be affixed, under present plans, but it is to be milder in tone than Senator Knox originally intended and will scarcely go far enough to afford all the assurance France desires. Any doubts regarding America's position, however, were removed by the despatch of a note to Berlin announcing Germany must make reparations to the extent of her ability.

Harding Considers Railroad Situation

PRESIDENT HARDING has taken up the railroad situation in an attempt to avert the serious labor troubles which are threatened, and while his program has not been outlined definitely it was predicted he would send a message on this subject to the special session of Congress. The President spent more than two hours in conference with Chairman Clark of the Interstate Commerce Commission and Chairman Barton of the Railroad Labor Board, receiving not only information regarding conditions but suggestions for remedial measures. Railroad managers and leaders of the employees were to be heard in later conferences.

Each road has been dealing with its own employees regarding reductions in wages and changes in working conditions—a course which involves long delay in the settlement of the controversy. Employees appealed to the President to call a conference of railroad executives and labor unions to settle such problems, after the executives had negatived such a proposal made through the Labor Board. One of the obstacles to a settlement has been the inability of the opposing factions to get together, and Mr. Harding might be able to overcome this handicap.

Chairman Clark was said to have taken the position that rates should be lowered in order to stimulate traffic, but that it was impossible to do this while operating costs, of which wages form such a large part, remained at their present level. It was predicted several railroads would go into receiverships by July unless a solution is found, the expected increase in traffic with the opening of Spring having failed to improve the finances of the lines. In some quarters there was a belief that the employees would accept reasonable wage cuts and the modification of objectionable working rules if the principle of collective bargaining was recognized, and that such a course promised the speediest solution of the controversy.

Germany Again Defies Allies

WITH the imposition of further penalties to force German acceptance of reparations demands awaiting the assembling a new Allied conference, the Berlin government again has defied the Allies, this time on disarmament measures.

At the recent conference of premiers in Paris a note was sent to Berlin demanding that Germany surrender the arms still due under the Versailles Treaty, disarm certain fortresses and give guarantees that war materials would be manufactured only in certain factories named by the Allies. The German reply asserted that all arms really due had been handed over and that the Allied figures were wrong by a million rifles; and denied the right of the Allies to forbid the manufacture of arms in factories not on the approved list, despite a specific treaty provision to that effect. It asserted that all the disarmament provisions had been fulfilled and offered to submit to an arbitration tribunal the points in dispute, a course which involve the Allies in all sorts of difficulties in seeking to enforce the treaty. Regarding the disarmament of the Eastern fortresses, Berlin sent a flat refusal, declaring the surrender of the arms in those citadels to be "impossible in view of present events in the East."

The Council of Ambassadors took up the German notes on disarmament and reparations, but no important action was scheduled until the Allied Premiers meet again, probably not long before May 1.

Order Restored in Germany

THE Communist revolt in Germany, which at no time had given promise of overturning the Ebert government, nevertheless died hard. Crushed in one town, it broke out in another and the government has had to be constantly on the alert. The opposition of organized labor to the Communist program and refusals by workers to heed calls for a general strike kept the disorders from assuming revolutionary proportions.

For a couple of days Berlin wore a battlefield aspect, with troops occupying the Wilhelmstrasse, which was closed to all traffic, and with the approaches to public buildings barricaded with barbed-wire entanglements. These measures were taken because of fears of a general strike, but such precautions proved unnecessary and the city soon was restored to its normal appearance.

Just when it seemed the Communist movement had collapsed altogether, there was a flare-up in various parts of the country and in one day more than 100 persons were killed in the renewal of the fighting. The more serious disorders were in Western Germany, the industrial districts where the Red strength is greatest, and the ferment spread to the occupied zone, particularly to the area held by the Belgians. In Duesseldorf the Allied officers returned arms to the police so they could defend the city against insurgents; and in Essen, within the range of the Allied guns, order was restored after fighting, in which fifteen Communists were killed and forty wounded in a day.

John Burroughs Dies

JOHAN BURROUGHS, world-famous naturalist and writer on nature topics, died suddenly on a train in Ohio while returning from California to his home overlooking the Hudson river, near Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Death came without warning, although he had been in a hospital for treatment recently, and he was talking to his physician-biographer when he fell dead. Burial was made on the eighty-fourth anniversary of his birth, near the spot where he was born.

The Spirit of the Master

A Sermon by REV. B. F. SAXON*

TEXT.—Matt. 5: 22. "But I say unto you—"

THE words "But I say unto you" are repeated five times in the first part of the Sermon on the Mount. This sermon, which is really the charter of the Heavenly Commonwealth, sets the moral standard and prescribes the religious duties of the Christian religion. In the first part of this remarkable discourse, five different references are made to the Mosaic Law, demanding not only its fulfillment, but in each case carrying that fulfillment beyond the letter into the realm of the spirit of the law.

The point is, that nothing is abrogated or annulled, but, rather, exceeded. Each "But I say unto you" is a commentary on the statement, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the Kingdom of Heaven." The thought of Jesus is that to the degree of this excess, His followers were to be "the salt of the earth" and "the light of the world." With this in mind, let us take up these five references in the order in which they are given.

Jesus says there are three stages of anger, the last of which may culminate in breaking the sixth commandment. These stages are, first, being angry with our brother; second, using an expression of abuse implying that he is negatively bad, that is, without goodness; third, asserting that he is positively wicked. These are the underlying distinctions, which are not so clearly suggested by the words "Raca" and "fool", in our English translation. The morality of Jesus leads back along the stream of anger quite a way from the precipice marked by the danger signal, "Thou shalt not kill," and does not stop even at the point of not being at odds with our brother; but He says if we should remember anything that might cause our brother to be angry, we must immediately seek to destroy that cause—in other words, we must close up the spring. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar,"—give up for a time even the most sacred activity of your life,—"and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." The thought is not one of forgiveness. That subject is not under discussion; but the idea conveyed is that the very excuse for anger must be destroyed.

During a summer vacation six years ago, I began to build a little cottage on the shore of a mountain lake, and although everything else was ideal, I could find no spring of water on my lot. For six summers I searched with hazel twigs and dug in vain. But last fall a road was run along the side of the mountain, and on visiting the place I found that from the upper bank at one spot, a number of tiny streams issued forth. Going farther up among the rocks and trees, I carefully sounded with a crowbar and finally succeeded in locating the long-sought spring, just six inches below the surface of the ground! A syphon from this spring would furnish water to a house ten stories high on the lake-side. As the mountain in this case covered its spring, so the Christian should control his temper that he "sin not," and never must his anger rise against his brother.

THE marriage relation was held very loosely in the time of Jesus. Not only did He sustain the ancient law as given in the seventh commandment, but He also clearly stated the one ground upon which a divorce could be granted. On that ground, no follower of His would ever think of going to Reno. It is not our purpose here to speak of the social evil, nor of the ever-growing multitude of divorces in our day and land, which are not approved by the teaching of this passage; but we would emphasize the fact that the righteousness which exceeds the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees is one that has to do with a man's secret thoughts. Jesus explicitly states that the wanton eye and the lustful hand cannot be brought into the Kingdom of Heaven, i.e., the Christian life. He says that if either the right eye or the right hand offend in this connection it were better to lose them,—it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.

Paul, catching the meaning of the Master, exclaims, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." Later on, in the same epistle, he repeats the question, "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?" And the innermost shrine of that temple—"the meditation of the heart"—must be pure.

Up at Kensico, near the breast of the great reservoir from which comes a part of New York City's water, there is a field of fountains. Multitudes of sprays spring into the air and sunlight, and then the water, thus purified, rushes into the conduits which carry it to the homes of the city. Having stood and looked at it there, clothed in white, dancing in the light, and crowned with all the colors of the rainbow, the resident ever after raises a glass of nature's beverage to his lips with keener relish. In like manner, Jesus would have us treat our thoughts, lifting them at their fountain above the level of the earth, where His spirit may breathe upon them. His light shine through them, and His beauty crown them. Then, when they manifest themselves in our home and social life, there will be no fear of contamination or curse.

FROM Jewish writings we have abundant evidence that the people to whom Jesus spoke were accustomed to hearing, even in common conversation, the frequent use of oaths. An oath was, and is today, a most solemn obligation to tell the truth or keep a promise. When an oath is taken, an impression of beginning of my study of this chapter, I came upon the words, "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." The mistake is often made in taking the apparent teaching of an isolated passage, and not studying it in relation to its context as a harmonious whole.

What was the spirit of the law, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"? Very evidently, it was intended to prevent the exaction of more than an equivalent to the misfortune suffered. It was as though it had read, "Only one eye for an eye and one tooth for a tooth." We see, therefore, that it was a law that did not demand retaliation, but that it headed in the opposite direction. As far as it went it was a good law, and those who kept it were deserving of credit. This will be apparent when we consider what a large place was given to the spirit of revenge in the life of ancient and primitive peoples. It was a common religious belief among many of them, that the soul of one who had been murdered could not rest in peace until his death had been fully avenged. Indeed, we do not have to go back to ancient history for illustrations of a trait which seems to be inherent in the human breast. We are told that after the Restoration in England, the body of Cromwell was taken from Westminster and hanged on a gallows at Tyburn.

Jesus says that we shall turn the other cheek, give the cloak with the coat, and go the second mile. These things are the flowers which grow on the grave of revenge, and are the unmistakable evidence that the spirit which the Mosaic law endeavored to curb has entirely passed out of existence in the life of the follower of Him, who "when He was reviled, reviled not again."

LOVE, that most sublime of all graces, did get over one-half of the road under the old rule, "Love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy." It seems to have been cause for congratulation that it got even as far as this. The term, "neighbor," included every one of the Jewish people. It was like saying we should love every member of the church to which we belong; and when we put our love to this test, we know that the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees had no mean goal in view. But Jesus pointed out the other half of the road over which love was to go before it reached its final and highest destination. It was the steep and rocky half, but it leads into the highlands of the spiritual life—"Love your enemies."

These last two references, concerning revenge and one's enemies, present the twofold attitude of a Christian toward those who would do him injury—passive at the call for retaliation; active in the exercise of that grace which alone will overcome enmity. It has been well said that the best way to kill an enemy is to make a friend of him.

"But," some one will say, "who is sufficient for all these things?" And it will be claimed that while we have a beautiful ideal set up by these statements of the Master, it is not expected that it shall be fully realized in every-day life. Jesus was intensely practical and means just that. This realization, however, is an absolute impossibility for what the Bible calls "the natural man." "The new man in Christ Jesus" obeys these laws. More than that, it becomes natural for him to do so. We often hear a statement like this: "It is difficult to live a Christian life." It is, for the man who is not a Christian; for him who is a Christian, having "passed from death unto life," it is difficult to live otherwise.

THE first annual convention of the American Waldensian Aid Society will be held in Washington, D. C., May 1, 2 and 3, and its forty societies scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific will send delegates. The program covers a broad field, touching the religious, educational and immigrant aid activities of the Society, and among the speakers will be: Bishop McDowell, of the M. E. Church; Dr. Cornelius Woolfkin, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York; Dr. Bruno Roselli, of Florence, first Italian exchange professor to America; and Rev. V. Alberto Costabel, of Milan, the Waldensian delegate to the United States and Canada. The general chairman of the convention is Dr. John Nelson Mills of Washington, and Bishop Darlington, of Harrisburg, will preside at one session.

The Waldensian movement is the most ancient Protestant movement which history records, and the Waldensians live in the Cottian Alps, in the Piedmont region. Since the middle ages they have endured thirty persecutions, and it was not until 1848 that they began to enjoy real religious freedom. Recently missionary work was started and now there are more than sixty Protestant churches and 150 mission stations throughout Italy outside the Waldensian valleys.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow." or "Nearer to Thee."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Christ the True Vine: John 15: 1-16.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 291, first column.)

Sermon—"THE SPIRIT OF THE MASTER"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"The Homeland, O the Homeland," or "Softly Now the Light of Day."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

O Thou who art strong, make us strong. Thou who art wise give us wisdom. Thou who seest the truth make us free in its eternal freedom. Thou who does not harbor malice even against our slowness of heart, but grieve over it, make us repentant and with the sorrow that refuses to sorrow over the same sins again. And from his hour's worship give us many a day's refreshment. In Jesus' name. AMEN.

absolute sincerity is meant to be conveyed. Therefore, one who is anxious to have a falsehood pass without suspicion is apt to clothe it with this sacred obligation. Against this practice stood the third commandment, and the law was repeated in Leviticus,—"Ye shall not swear by my name falsely." The keeping of this law constituted a part of the "righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees." They told the truth under oath. When they spoke in italics they could be believed.

Going far beyond this, the morality of Jesus requires that the Christian be habitually sincere. Rather than having to be "put upon his honor" on certain occasions, honor becomes a foundation stone in the house where he continually resides. Ever candid in speech, always honest in business, never failing in his promises and obligations, and absolutely true in all his relations of life, the Christian's word is as good as his bond, and his communication needs only the simple "yea, yea; nay, nay."

It is not necessary for the lion to growl—at least, not strenuously—in order to convey an impression; there is no call for a Chinaman to swear to his orientalisms; no heavenly doorman needs to stand at the gates of dawn to announce the coming of the sun. Just so, the Christian's character for honesty and integrity vouches for itself.

THE fourth "But I say unto you" had always seemed to me to introduce a change. It sounded like abrogation rather than increased emphasis. The ancient law, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," appeared to be diametrically opposed to the new law, "Resist not evil."

When I first considered the subject of this sermon, it was "The Annulments of Jesus." Then, in the very

The Lord's Chastening

SUNDAY. Heb. 12 : 6. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." "Loveth . . . chasteneth." The association of the two words is everything. Unite them, and there is light and hope; divorce them, and there is darkness and death. To bring them together is to relate the vine-dresser's knife to the purple grapes; it lays the sharp-toothed harrow side by side with the blowing corn. To wed love to chastening is to put purpose into pain and to give direction to seemingly aimless grief. It sets a very tender and holy light upon the horizon, and the light throws its cheering beams far down the most desolate way. We are told much of what we want to know when it is said that chastening is not in the careless hands of brutal chance, but in the firm hands of the Lover Who is revealed to us in Christ.

Well, then, there are some seemingly hard things in life which do not come from any hardness in God. There is a flame which is not kindled by anger, but by love. It was the want of this assurance which burdened so many pilgrims who are seen on the Old Testament roads. They related the dark things in their experience to the displeasure of God. They interpreted their shadows as His frowns. Their sufferings were regarded as the strokes of divine revenge. Adversity was a proof of God's ill-favor. They looked upon disappointment as a witness that He had forsaken them. Now and again, a man caught a glimpse of the inner truth of things, and it was amazing how it transformed his world. Here is one of them singing—"In the night His song shall be with me." That man is looking at things as they really are. He has caught a glimpse of the Lover in the blighted garden, and he is not afraid.

The purpose of God's chastening is not punitive but creative. He chastens "that we might be partakers of His holiness." The phrase "that we might be" has direction in it, and the direction points towards a purified and beautified life. The fire which is kindled is not a bonfire, blazing heedlessly and unguardedly, and consuming precious things; it is a refiner's fire, and the Refiner sits by it, and He is firmly and patiently and gently bringing holiness out of carelessness and stability out of weakness. God is always creating even when He is using the darker means of grace. He is producing the fruits and flowers of the spirit. His love is always in quest of lovely things.

Out of all this we may draw a very comforting conclusion; the absence of joy does not mean the absence of God. "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous but grievous." And yet there are many believers who, when the emotion of joy is not beating in the heart, interpret it as a sign of spiritual lapse and alienation. It is regarded as a severance of the fellowship of God. But the pruned vine does not suggest an absent vine-dresser, and even if the vine be bleeding, it does not mean that He has gone away. And my emotions may change from sorrow to grief, but God remains faithful. My fickle moods do not mean a capricious Friend. Joy will be mine again, and it will be all the richer and the deeper because of God's chastening. His chastenings are just His ministries for the deepening of the soul, for the increase of its receptiveness; He is seeking the enlargement of its capacity for the apprehension of Himself.

The April showers bring the May flowers. "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous . . . but afterwards it yieldeth the peaceful fruits of righteousness." And so the frost is related to the harvest, the harrow is the friend of our daily bread.

Finding Life

MONDAY. Matt. 10 : 39. "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." This is one of the numerous paradoxes of the Bible. Jesus was fond of such sayings. No one likes to lose anything of value. Instinct is against it. This saying seems to reverse the law of acquisition. It does not reverse it, but it seems to. It is a matter of method.

Christ says the best things are to be had by renunciation. The student loses much in order to gain scholarship. The gold-hunter loses much for the sake of treasure. Both of these, however, are measurably selfish. At any rate they are selfial. Let us come up higher. Here is a soldier leaving home. What has he gained? It is not a question of what he gains, but of what the cause for which he fights may gain? Who is it that loses his life? Really it is he who knows not the meaning of sacrifice, he of the self-centered life.

There are two ways of treating life. One is to look upon it as a possible field for adventure or exploitation. The other is to look upon it as a grain-field, with tough sod to be broken up, dry places to be irrigated, swamps to be drained, seeds to be planted, weeds to be watched and uprooted, in order that when the harvest comes life may be rich. This is the loss that pays in the end. The heroes of the world are those who have not considered loss. They have "endured the cross, despising the shame," that they might lay hold on the joy that was set before them.

The secret of spiritual renunciation is in the phrase, "for my sake." We surrender life not for the sake of life, but for the sake of Christ. The love of Christ constraineth us. The hope of the future is in the growing power of this motive. Faith in Christ leads to love, and love leads to living for Him, and we shall find life as Christ has told us, by giving up our own.

The Seed Catalogue

TUESDAY. 1 Cor. 1 : 18. "It is the power of God." The seed catalogue, advance sheet of summer, is in the mails. Soon we shall look through its pages, and feast our eyes and satisfy our artistic sense upon the myriad colors and grandeurs of creation. Mohammed said, "If I had two loaves of bread, I would sell one and buy violets with which to feed my soul." We know just what he meant when we examine the seed catalogue.

But why violets? There are so many varieties of growing things. We may not be able to roll the coccinea superbas and the multifloras and grandifloras around our tongues like a latinist; but we can enjoy the manifestations of God in the science of botany. Linnaeus, scanning the wayside bloom with his microscope, said: "In the unfolding blossom I see the purpose of God and bow my head in reverence." As the Bible is the written revelation of God's power, so the seed catalogue is a Bible too, in the sense that it is another written and illustrated revelation of the same power. Who can make a seed? The boy can whittle something from a piece of wood that looks like a seed, but it will not grow. The power of God alone gives life. Here is a bulb. It is rough and without hint of beauty. Put it in the ground.

"O little bulb uncouth,
Ragged and rusty brown;
Have you some dew of youth?
Have you a velvet gown?
Plant me and see
What I shall be—
God's fine surprise
Before your eyes."

This is an epic of life, that from the unlovely comes the lovely, from the mediocre comes the majestic, from the hut comes the sage, jurist, statesman, emancipator. By the power of God come the rarest things from the commonest of soils. Christianity has demonstrated the glory in the commonplace; the lily in the muck and has proven that "in the mud and scum of things, there something always, always sings."

The blossoming bud is the emblem of God's unfolding plan. Out of a prison we get the moral beauty of John Howard. Out of the midnight dens of thieves and habitats of the underworld comes the righteousness of a Dollinger. By the power of God the sinner becomes a saint, the unkind man becomes kind, the swearer a preacher and all the sons of men the sons of God. The seed, the soil and the sower play a large part in the demonstration of the power of God for the establishment of His Kingdom.

The Unsearchable Love of Christ

WEDNESDAY. Eph. 3 : 18. "The breadth and length, the depth and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge." Love pervades all the attributes of God. It is the essence of God Himself. Four-sided love encircles the Godhead. The Cross is a measure of infinite love to save. The Cross measures the four sides of love.

The breadth of love is like the wideness of the sea which stretches far beyond human vision, rolling its billows along all shores. The ocean of God's bosom reaches all races, languages and conditions of human need. Every soul wrecked, washed upon the shores of time, may be rescued and reconstructed to make the voyage safely to the home port of the eternal.

O the depths of the riches of the love of Christ for lost men! How unsearchable, incomprehensible and past finding out. Love's heights are the opposite of its depths; higher than the highest heaven. The upward flight of the soul will ever behold higher heights in the lofty range of God's great mountains of loving-kindness. There will be room for exploration while eternal ages roll. He who loved you and gave Himself for you will lead you on in the new discoveries of love that will ever be passing knowledge to fully understand.

How glorious to realize that there is no end to the universe of God, no end to the ocean of His love, no terminus to the joy of the union of soul with the Father and the Son in His family of saints and angels.

The Truth That Frees the Soul

THURSDAY. John 8 : 32. "The truth shall make you free." Superstition is bondage to unreality and slavery to fear. Ignorance is a chain about the feet of humanity. Scepticism is imprisonment in dungeon-like surroundings where light never comes. Freedom belongs only to those who have broken the bonds of superstition and ignorance and come out of darkness into light.

Truth is the great Emancipator. Human slavery could not stand before it. The drink traffic, with its fierce chains of habit, must flee before its coming. Truth enlarges the boundaries and lifts the horizon of life. To know the truth is to hold the key that unlocks unnumbered doors that have long been closed. We can exchange our narrow and crowded quarters for larger.

Let us distinguish truth from falsehood by this fruit. Truth never sends a man into a dungeon of hopelessness. Only a lie does that. Truth never sets limits to the spirit of investigation. Only a false creed does that. The truth never ties one generation hand and foot with precedents and traditions, which it is a sin to break. It speaks another language: "It hath been said by them of old time . . . but I say unto you"—and the chains begin to fall away. The Truth makes men free.

The Pure in Heart

FRIDAY. Matt. 5 : 8. "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." How many times you have read this passage, and for a moment were filled with its lofty sentiment. But alas! that wonderful feeling was fleeting, for you may have thought "this is for the pure in heart, and I am not pure."

But wait a moment! It does not say the "faultless," the "perfect," or anything like this; but plainly it states, "the pure IN HEART." Jesus never used "cant" expressions, and so here we have one of the finest things He ever uttered.

What do we mean when we sometimes say a man is good at heart? Do we mean that he has no faults? Far from it; it may just be that his faults are very apparent, and that we are able to see past these shortcomings and sympathize with him, as we see the real good that lies underneath. At heart he may be as good as any one of us; but he has "head tides and contrary winds" that we have never had to struggle against—hence failures and mistakes.

Now, my doubting, oft-discouraged friend, do you honestly, down in your heart, love God and regret the zig-zag path you have made? When you find yourself looking upon some failure of yours, do you feel like poor old Peter who "went out and wept bitterly?" If so, I think I should take, at least the promise of this text, and hug it to my heart and rest. And I think that somehow you will catch a vision that will make you "see God" in your own life and in the lives of others; and the presence of our Heavenly Father will become so sweet to you, that you will draw more and more closely to Him.

The High Cost of Dying

SATURDAY. Job 21 : 23-24. "One dieth in his full strength being wholly at ease and quiet—and another dieth in the bitterness of his soul." A while back, I stepped off a train and passing out of the station, started up the streets of a city where I had once been a minister. I paused to make way for a magnificent funeral procession. Twelve coaches followed the hearse drawn by twelve span of superb white horses. All the trappings and appointments were of the same aristocratic quality. It was a funeral that must have cost a lot of money. People lined the curbs to let the procession pass. This funeral procession was effective in a certain way! For one thing, it made us forget the H. C. of L. and turned our attention to the high cost of dying.

A few days later another casket was set in state on the grounds of a large home for orphans and friendless children. First there passed rows on rows of children; little tots in front, larger ones following. Each child dropped a white flower on the silent form of a man, noble even in death. Each one, I think, dropped a tear also. Then came the people, the real people; streams of them with wet faces. It was not an expensive funeral, for no showy parade could shed added glory upon the life of this man. It was the Founder of the home; once a rich man, who gave not only his fortune but almost his whole time to fathering these homeless waifs.

The first man's funeral cost his estate much, in many ways, but that of the second cost comparatively nothing; as he had spent all he had for others. To him to live was Christ, but to die was gain.

Why we can sell a TAILORED SUIT of finest all-wool for $25⁰⁰

For 50 years we have made fine all-wool men's suits and sold them to the biggest clothing makers in the country. Frankly, we have felt there was something economically wrong when we regularly found suits made from our own fabrics selling in stores for $50 to $70.

We reasoned, why not make our own cloth output into tailored suits and sell direct to the wearer. The price could be ever so much lower because we need ask no more than our regular manufacturing price on the cloth, plus the actual cost of tailoring.

That's our story—and it's worth $25 to $40 saving to any man, plus the satisfaction of a tailored-to-measure garment.

We send you the cloth samples, style book and easy measurement blank, you make your selection and in about two weeks you have your suit.

WRITE TODAY for samples of cloth; you'll be amazed at the fine quality and handsome patterns for spring.

We also make boy's Knicker Suits for only $7.50 (or $9.00 with extra pants) using same fine cloth as for men's suits.

ALL-WOOL CLOTH $1.50 to $3.00 per yard. Suits, cloakings and skirtings. All cloth 56 inches wide. Samples free.

Blue Curtains in a Window

THERE'S a window, in the house that stands directly opposite my apartment, that is hung with curtains of a soft blue color. It's a long narrow, rather old-fashioned window of the French type, with the gleam of fresh white paint around the casing and a dark sill that, seen dimly through the glass, might be mahogany. It's an aristocrat of a window—one to make up stories about:

During the winter time, when it is very cold and nearly all well-behaved windows are tight-closed, the blue curtains hang with a calm severity of line on either side of the pane. Sometimes, from my apartment, I can see a flicker of warm lamp-light shining between the folds of them—sometimes I can see the ruddy glow of a fire. But when spring comes—when radiant summer is on the way, and nearly all well-behaved windows are left wide open—the blue curtains blow about gaily whenever there is the smallest suggestion of a breeze.

I have never seen any person—any real person—standing in the window. But I have imagined many folk—gracious white-haired men and women, and young smiling mothers, and wee youngsters with straight hair cut in bangs across their foreheads. I have imagined the sort of a family that ought to belong to such a pleasant window—I cannot help feeling that only a very lovely person would have chosen curtains of such a wonderful color. I am sure, as I watch them blowing in the breeze, that they shelter happiness—only happiness, and nothing else—from the curious gaze of the passers-by. And often I find the happiness of the home that I cannot see, the home that is hidden from my eyes, reflected in my own heart.

THERE are other windows on the same block that are not curtained in blue. Indeed, there are some windows that are not curtained at all! Some windows have dingy sills that could never, by any stretch of imagination, resemble mahogany. And some of the casings look as though white paint were an unheard-of luxury. Some of them are quite frankly dirty—some of them seem only unduly careless.

It is hard to imagine that pleasant dream people live back of the dingy, uncurtained windows. There is nothing exciting about them, nothing that thrills the imagination. They are only

One Feels, Because They Are Beautiful, They Shelter Happiness

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

windows—and most of them need washing. They utterly lack the romance of the blue-curtained one, they absolutely lack any suggestion of happiness.

When I glance up at these other windows, in passing, I am very apt to see half-filled milk bottles balanced precariously upon the sill, or a rumpled bag of fruit, or a saucer of left-over pudding. And as I go past, hurriedly, I am very apt to imagine that I can hear voices raised in anger, and over-loud laughter, coming from the rooms in back of them.

As a matter of fact, I am probably wrong. The people who live in the uncurtained rooms are doubtless just as charming, just as worth knowing as the people who live back of the blue curtains. But one would never guess it from the exterior. And when one only sees the exterior there is no other way of guessing!

I HAVE worked with many people, during the years that I have spent in coming to an office. And some of them have been as attractive to look at as the window with the blue curtains, and some of them have been unpleasing as the other windows—the ones that have no curtains. And I have noticed that the people who are neat and charming and interesting get ahead faster than the people who are a bit untidy and careless.

"I hired my secretary," I once heard a successful business man say, "because she was wearing such immaculate collar and cuffs when she called to ask for a position. She looked as if she was exceedingly particular about her personal appearance—as if the little things were as important to her as the big things. I couldn't help feeling that she would keep my work up to the mark; I couldn't help feeling that my desk and my filing cabinets would be as neat, always, as her collar and cuffs. And so I hired her!"

It's curious to think of hiring a girl for a responsible position because of her collar and cuffs. But that sort of thing is done over and over again, I fancy, in the business world.

"First of all," said a woman who is personnel manager of a great factory, "I look into a girl's eyes. And then I glance quickly at her clothing. And if she meets my eyes and her clothing is neat, I hire her. Lots of shabby girls come to me, and I give work to them! Shabbiness and lack of style don't mean a thing in my life. All that I demand is that she be as clean as possible, that she make the most of herself!"

Yes, lots of people—men as well as girls—are hired because they have been clever enough to realize that blue curtains go a great way toward making attractive the window of life. A great many people get on, not only in business but in their social and home lives because they instinctively know the value of a pleasing exterior. And a great many people go through the world with really sterling qualities unrecognized because they hide those qualities behind something that is dingy.

IT'S hard to believe, at first glance, that a tidy, happy home lies behind an untidy, unattractive window. And it's hard to realize that a careful, efficient personality dwells in back of a soiled exterior. And so, many people are misunderstood—many people are never appreciated.

I fancy that it wasn't a great task to make the blue curtains that hang in the window directly opposite my apartment. I fancy that a bit of hemming and a bit of pinning up don't take many minutes. And yet the effect is worth ever so much, for it creates an atmosphere of happiness and peace and—more than that—of real caste.

I imagine that it didn't take a great deal of time, either, for a certain girl to launder the white collar and cuff set that won her a very fine position. But that collar and cuff set suggested, at once, a standard of quality.

Often times, when the sky is blue and glowing, I find myself wondering what lies behind the blue of it—wondering what the Home beyond the sky is like. I can't help feeling that it must be a very marvelous place; it couldn't be anything but wonderful because of the curtains that hang, so gloriously, between it and the world! It's a continuous lesson to us, who have earth windows that should be kept neat, always, and beautiful!

Heroic Work in Famine Relief

By (MRS. J.) ROSALIND GOFORTH
of Kikungshan, China

the Mission to which Miss Pettersson belongs, being strained to the utmost to meet its regular obligations, could not undertake any financial help for this work, so Miss Pettersson simply went forward and "asked her Father" as she needed money for the needy ones.

As we passed along through these courts and story after story was rapidly poured into my ears of this and that one, a tragedy seemed connected with each woman and child. This young woman with a tiny baby pressed to her bosom has such sorrowful eyes and little wonder, for her husband had just been killed in a fight with the robber bands that are terrorizing the people everywhere. That woman was from a family where four had already died of starvation. Here a child was brought forward and his head uncovered revealing many cruel scars, silent witnesses to the awful treatment the poor child had received. I was told that when this boy was admitted he was simply a bundle of bruised bones, the result of vicious blows by his brother-in-law because of the child's following his sister when the father and mother had died of starvation. Only the utmost care had brought the child back to life.

It was with a sense of relief I turned to a young, happy looking woman with a tiny baby girl in her arms and heard this beautiful story of how the family had been saved. Though ordinarily in comfortable circumstances, the famine had struck them hard and when the baby girl was but three weeks old the father bundled the child up and laid it on a door step some distance away. Here it was found the next morning nearly dead and taken to Miss Pettersson, who took it into her own room and had it tenderly cared for. On the father returning home from parting with his baby he said to his wife: "If we stay here we will all die. You take our two boys and seek a new home. If after the famine you want to return to me do so, but if you are happier elsewhere, stay. I love you, but it will be all right." In tears they separated. The woman wandered about with the boys, then took them to Miss Pettersson. The mother, too, was admitted to care for one of the orphan children. Many days later the elder boy was in Miss Pettersson's room when he recognized his little sister's cap. He darted over to the bed where a baby lay covered with a quilt. Lifting the coverlet he recognized his own little baby sister. With a shout of delight he rushed back to his mother and told her of his discovery. So like Moses and his mother, the woman received her own child back again. Later the father was found and helped sufficiently to ensure his getting through till the harvest, when they hope to become again a united family.

CONTRIBUTIONS to the Christian Herald China Fund for the week amounted to $6,066.53, bringing the total up to $517,453.60.

“What! My Car?”

Weed Tire Chains

“Yes! Skidded — and it’s up to you. You failed to provide the chauffeur with Tire Chains. Only good luck saved your wife from paying the supreme penalty for your negligence. She’s on the way to the hospital, painfully injured, but the doctor thinks she’ll pull through.”

How strange it is that disaster must come to some men before they realize that all tires will skid on wet pavements and muddy roads when not equipped with Chains.

The time to provide against accidents is before they happen. Don’t wait until after the first skid. Put Weed Chains on all four tires at the first indication of slippery going and you will have quadruple protection against injury, death, car damage and lawsuits.

Poverty and Wealth

International Sunday-School Lesson for April 24

Isa. 5:8; Amos 8:4-7; Luke 16:19-25

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

POVERTY and wealth are related closely to the subject for last Sunday's lesson—work. A few have riches thrust upon them, but most people gain their wealth through hard work, while many are poor because they will not toil arduously. If some who are poor spent as much directed energy in working as they waste time and strength in grumbling against the rich they would possess more of this world's goods.

Many, though they have many dollars, are poor when it comes to abiding values. A recent New York paper contained an account of one who had dollars when he died and who revealed his character by leaving instructions that $15,000 should be expended on his funeral. This study is written in Durham, N. C., where the writer is acting as one of the honorary pallbearers at the funeral of the wealthiest man in that state, George W. Watts. The negro room-woman at the hotel just said: "We have lost a great friend. He was good to the poor." Among his many benevolences Mr. Watts supported an entire mission station in Korea with more than fourteen missionaries. Of course a person can be both rich and a genuine Christian.

The lesson is not an abstract study of poverty and wealth, but rather "What the Bible teaches about poverty and wealth." Every reference in the lesson helps should be looked up. Note especially the Bible portions selected by the International Lessons Committee for use, if desired, in the various grades or departments in the Sunday school. The Primaries have their attention directed to the Shunamite woman who gave to others, and the Juniors study about the Rich Fool and Barnabas.

Poverty is too often a personal fault. Many are joining the bread lines today who earned more money during the war than did the so-called white-collar group. They squandered their money as fast as they received it. "Tithing" to such people would be a meaningless word.

THE lecture method is inadequate in presenting this lesson. There should be general discussion by the class. The whole world is a field for investigation. As Christ said, "The poor ye have with you always." There are countless millions in non-Christian lands who are daily fighting starvation. The three great famine centers are just exaggerations of a general condition. There are hungry people within reach of every Sunday-school class. At no age in history has this world been so touched with the feeling of the infirmities of the poor and needy. People are learning that "it is more blessed to give than to receive," and it is still true, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

The majority in the great Sunday-school army of teachers can be classed as the average person. The prayer recorded in Proverbs 30:8 is still in order: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; Feed me with the food that is needful for me."

Ambition must be of the highest type, but it should not destroy contentment in enjoying the worldly goods gained by hard work and the blessing of God. After all real work does not consist in the possession of things (read Luke 12:15-21). The only dependable gold is the kind that is defined in Rev. 3:17-18. Make your daily deposits in the Bank of Heaven.

Amos prophesied to the Northern Kingdom, which today is associated with the lost ten tribes of Israel. That Kingdom decided to abandon Sabbath-keeping, while sabbatic and jubilee years ceased to exist for them. They did not circumvent God or make void His prophecies. The seventy years of captivity in Babylonia total the years which the Jews refused, in their later years, to keep sacred for Jehovah, and when He was ready full payment was made. In God's time the ground of the Hebrew did lie fallow. Keeping the Sabbath holy is a present-day obligation. Using that day for self-interests is stealing from the Lord, which is always an unprofitable business, just like cheating in the matter of weights and measures.

Saving the first one hundred dollars marks an epoch in the life of any young person, or adult too. Many have reached the age of fifty and have never had $100 laid up as a result of savings. Teachers will do well in urging habits of thrift upon each member of their classes. The Government helped greatly in this by Liberty Loans and War Savings Stamps. These investments thus held today represent the only savings that multitudes in this country possess. They will not fully realize the value to themselves of their patriotic investments till the maturity of the bonds upon which they are now receiving interest. Some are saving by investing in building and loan shares. "B and L" can have a fine meaning when applied to "Building through service" and "Lending to the Lord." Some will never have wealth here, but they will be rich in heaven—which lasts for ever—by laying up treasures there. Daily service and investments of prayer make wonderful deposits in God's treasury.

THE Golden Text for today always brings back an experience when a pastor. A man and wife came together before the session seeking admission to church membership. When asked what induced them to take this stand for Jesus Christ they said: "The verse you quoted at the funeral of our baby—'For where your treasure is there will your heart be also.'"

The parable of the rich man and Lazarus furnishes material for joyous meditation and careful study. While heaven and hell are clearly presented Jesus did not intend that this story should be used as a map of the places of reward and punishment. Those who want to eliminate the word "fire" from having any serious meaning would do well to consider the wisdom uttered by an old slave in the Southland. When asked by his owner where the Lord was going to get enough brimstone to burn all the bad folks who are, have been, and are to be, the Christian negro replied: "They makes it here and takes it wid 'em." The Lord does not lack for resources and, further, the eternal burning of a guilty conscience supplies a tremendous, never-ending sensation.

Dives, so-called, for he does not even have a name in the parable, had wealth, but failed in his stewardship. God's auditing of accounts is absolutely exact and no transaction is lost sight of. Lazarus, who would have been content with crumbs, by reason of the hidden life which he possessed, was able to have place forever at the Marriage Supper of the Lamb. He had been kind to sympathetic dogs and went the limit of his resources in helping his fellows, but now Abraham's bosom is his heavenly address, and he continues to do the will of his God.

After completing your study of this lesson, turn again to your Bible and read the lesson text in full. Take the portion in Luke first this time. Think about the character of "Dives," who at one time was indifferent to Lazarus and later—for life is continuous, here and hereafter—desired to use him. He could even call him by name when he wanted a favor. Now read the portions in Isaiah and Amos and meditate on the fact that land-grabbing, false weights and measures, disdain of the Sabbath, etc., will do much toward making another nameless rich man who is poor indeed.

"This blue flame with the clean white tips is the hottest."

"It's just the flame to use for baking, or boiling, or any kind of fast cooking. And the beauty of it is that it doesn't blacken your pots or pans."

How the New Perfection Banishes Soot

Doesn't it remind you of the story of Beauty and the Beast when you see snowy-white mashed potatoes in an ugly soot-blackened pan? But, like the Beast in the fairy tale, that soot is not a real beast. It is merely good heat gone wrong! In other words, it is fuel that should have been turned into cooking heat. The New Perfection stove keeps your pans so clean because it turns all the kerosene oil—every drop—into cooking heat.

That Long Blue Chimney burner provides room for complete combustion of the kerosene—every drop has time to burn up into intense heat before it reaches the cooking pan. That's how the New Perfection banishes the Beast—the frowning smoke and unpleasant odor.

And that's why your pans keep shiny—why your kitchen stays cool and comfortable. More than 3,000,000 women now use New Perfections!

Just as fast as the kerosene oil is turned into clean heat, a powerful draft drives it forcefully, in one hot concentrated stream up against the utensil.

New Perfection Cooks Anything

New Perfection cooks know they can make anything—from doughnuts to the most delicate sponge cake. It gives speedy, steady, clean cooking heat for all occasions.

Each burner is almost a cook stove itself. You can keep the teakettle simmering with the low flame. On another burner you can use the medium flame—an all blue flame—for most ordinary cooking purposes. And for fast cooking, there's the high flame with the clean white tips. It's the hottest.

It Has a Speedy, Steady Fire

At any flame-speed, the New Perfection is the same—steady and dependable. Once set, the flame stays put. And it's always visible through the mica doors.

Brass Burners Make for Long Life

One of the reasons why the New Perfection shows such a long healthy life-line is that every part is made right. The New Perfection burner, for example, is solid brass—not merely brass finished. It never rusts, nor does it burn out, even with years of constant service.

Your dealer will gladly demonstrate the New Perfection—see him, or write us for the free New Perfection Booklet.

The Growth of the Bible

B. Y. P. U. Psa. 119: 97-112

Special Reading: "The Bible and Missions" by Montgomery. Chapter 3

THE Bible is the most popular Book in existence. In the time of Henry III the price of a manuscript copy of the Bible would have sufficed to build a couple of the arches of London Bridge. Today millions of copies are produced annually and the prices are so low that each person may own one.

James Anthony Froude, the historian, said: "The Bible is in itself a liberal education." This is the opinion of all educators, religious and secular. Progress and civilization are built on the Bible. The teachings of the Bible are permeating into distant lands, and its wisdom and truth are remaking the map of the world. Its style is influencing literature, and its theme is glorifying art. It is the Word of God and when spoken with the lip and lived with the life raises humanity to the highest power of achievement and regenerates the lowest type of man to the citizenship of the Kingdom of Heaven.

The Bible is the text-book of the world, the Light of its men and institutions, and the one infallible guide to its God-given destiny. It is the Sun of the Soul, giving warmth and nurture, as the Sun of the Solar System gives its health and strength to the physical being. "As the sun is to the Rose, so is Jesus Christ to my soul," said Alfred Tennyson. Jesus Christ is the Word made Flesh. Mankind can not exist without the word.

A Good Name and How to Obtain It

C. E. Job 29: 1-25; Prov. 22: 1

JOB laments the loss of his good name. It is something that calls for lamentation indeed. The author of Proverbs says, "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches and loving favor rather than silver and gold." All history is eloquent concerning the advantages of having a good name, the honor and respect of one's fellow-beings. It is worth fighting to obtain and worth fighting to maintain. Perhaps we will not have such difficulty in getting a good name preserved once we have attained the distinction.

The question arises, "How are we to get a good name?" It is something that money, good birth, social status, fine clothes, good looks can not purchase. Character is not a thing of externals, but an internal possession. In order to have a good name one must be good. To be good means that we are to be Godly, Godlike. Goodness means Godness. More people have failed because they lack goodness rather than ability. What is goodness? "They who do the will of God shall know of the doctrine." It is safe to say, because all history has manifested it, that the world will not only admire, but lay down its life for the really good man or woman. Jesus Christ is very popular. The chief reason for His popularity is His goodness, His Godness.

Self Control and How to Get It: Its Rewards

E. L. 1 Cor. 9: 24-27

THIS theme was discussed under B. Y. P. U., topic for January 16. As additional material we give the following:

Remember that when you are in the right you can afford to keep your temper, and when you are in the wrong you can not afford to lose it. "Self-conquest is the greatest of all victories."—Plato. "To rule one's anger is well; to prevent it is better."—Jonathan Edwards.

Self-mastery comes through Christ-mastery. Does Christ master you? He mastered Paul, who said "I am the bond-slave of Christ." Study the life of Paul and you will learn the history of one of the world's great conquerors.

EXPERT LUMBER SERVICE FOR THE MAN WHO WANTS TO BUILD

HERE is a service of the greatest practical importance to the family looking forward to owning its home.

To the farmer for his house, barns, corn cribs.

To the industrial man and corporation, planning expansion, replacements, repairs—or using lumber in manufacture.

A service that may add 100% to the value of your lumber purchase—whether you buy a couple of boards, a truck load of dimension stuff, or think in terms of millions of board feet to the single order.

This service means nothing less than expert advice in using the right wood in its proper place—based on detailed scientific knowledge of the various species of wood, their strengths, their fitnesses, and their individual action under specific conditions of use.

It may be a new thought to you, for instance, that in building a house lumber must be selected for three totally different functions.

There is the framework—which requires strength above all else.

There is the outside finish—demanding durability under exposure to the weather.

And the inside trim—where the need is for a wood properly seasoned and prepared, that will “stay put”, and that will be attractive when stained, or will take and hold paint or enamel.

For each of these functions certain woods are especially adapted.

For some, cheaper woods will give as good service as more expensive species. In other instances, cheaper woods can be used only at a sacrifice of durability and ultimate economy.

The same principle—the right wood in its proper place—applies to farm buildings, industrial buildings, and all industrial uses of lumber.

The proper use of lumber was never more important to America than it is at this moment.

To the individual citizen it means durable and economical building.

To the nation at large it means still more—a great step toward an ample supply of lumber, present and future—the elimination of waste in the thoughtless use of lumber.

What we advocate is conservation and economy through the use of the right wood in its proper place.

To this end we will supply to lumber dealers and to the public, any desired information as to the qualities of the different species and the best wood for a given purpose.

This service will be as broad and impartial as we know how to make it. We are not partisans of any particular species of wood. We advise the best lumber for the purpose, whether we handle it or not.

From now on the Weyerhaeuser Forest Products trade-mark will be plainly stamped on our product.

When you buy lumber for any purpose, no matter how much or how little, you can look at the mark and know that you are getting a standard article of known merit.

Weyerhaeuser Forest Products are distributed through the established trade channels by the Weyerhaeuser Sales Company, Spokane, Washington, with branch offices and representatives throughout the country.

When Buddhist Nuns Read "Buffalo Bill"

in Korea. The reason is this: White is the mourning color of Korea. The mourning period is three years. Whenever a member of royalty died the entire population had to put on white.

It happened at one time that royalty died off so fast that no sooner had the people put off their white clothes than they had to put them on again. So they very sensibly decided to wear white all the time and be ready for emergencies.

IN THE modern gown there is a pocket. There were no pockets in the old Korean gown. But the Christian Korean needed a place to put his Bible, for coming to church without a Bible is practically unknown in Korea. Following American example he made a pocket in his clothing, the first one known to the natives and hence still called the "Bible pocket."

There are few countries where Christian missions have yielded bigger results than in Korea. One new convert for every hour, night and day, since missionary work began more than a generation ago—that is Korea's record. There are now more than 300,000 Christians.

Nor are converts easily admitted. In many churches it is an unwritten rule that a believer may not be admitted to full membership until he has brought at least one person to Christ.

Jack London, when he passed through Korea, said: "Do you mean to say that these poor Koreans build their own churches and support their pastors and school teachers? Well, their Christianity means something to them then!"

The atrocities inflicted upon Korean Christians by their Japanese rulers, so pitifully discounting the really excellent work Japan has done in the material development of the country, have put the native Christians to the test. The martyrs of Rome and Carthage did not excel in devotion the martyrs of Korea, and Christianity has, as usual, been strengthened by persecution.

The Japanese blame the Christian religion for spreading ideas of democracy among the Koreans, thus causing them to chafe under the iron hand of Nippon. Perhaps they are right.

MISSIONARIES not only carried the religion of democracy into Korea, but brought in the first modern ideas of education, medicine and hygiene. No hospital or dispensary was known in Korea until one was founded by a Christian missionary.

Korean doctors diagnosed for devils rather than for germs. The human body can be pierced in three hundred places with a red-hot needle without causing death, the native physicians will tell you. The art of the doctor is to know just where to pierce, whether to use a three-inch needle or a twelve-inch needle, and what sort of a devil can be expected to come out through the aperture. The "medicines" which the native doctors prescribe are less painful but almost as absurd, among them being warm blood from the tip of a white dog's ear.

Think by way of contrast of the medical science of such mission hospitals as the Severance Hospital in Seoul. Here there is a food research department—an eye department—an eye-glass department—an ear, nose and throat department—a skin disease department—an X-Ray department—a surgical department with operating room—a pediatrics department—a department for the manufacture of drugs—a dental department—a department for the study of hookworm—and so on.

Missions have brought enlightenment to the mind, healing to the body, quickening to the spirit of Korea. Nowhere in the world is Christianity more appreciated and respected. Christian and Bible words have grown into the language. Traders like to deal with natives who are Christians for they are recognized to be more reliable than their fellows.

And when a child cries the Korean father often soothes it by saying:

"Don't cry! I will give you in marriage to a Christian."

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—To yield 6 to 7 per cent. Ask for circulars 4-6.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co. 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Record of Investments Chart—a simple chart for listing your securities which shows at a glance your monthly and annual income, together with necessary information on Federal Taxes—Ask for Circular 39.

Barnsall Corporation, 7 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold bonds to yield about 9 per cent. own and operate properties in 14 States. Total net assets 377 per cent. of this issue. Circular 40.

Circular 41 gives full information concerning a 7 per cent. First and Refunding Mortgage Bond yielding about 8 per cent. 1920 earnings amounted to more than twice the annual interest charges on all underlying bonds including this issue.

You Can Start with $100

You do not have to accumulate a thousand dollars in order to buy Prudence Bonds. You can buy them in small $100 denominations and start your money working at 6% from the moment you make your investment.

And remember—

6% Prudence Bonds, secured by first-mortgages on income earning properties, are unconditionally guaranteed as to interest and principal.

The World News of the Week

Theodore Roosevelt and was his ardent defender in the "nature faking" controversies in which Mr. Roosevelt indulged so vigorously while an occupant of the White House. They made several trips together in the study of wild life and natural phenomena in various parts of the country, and one of Mr. Burroughs's books was "Camping and Tramping with Roosevelt." In recent years two of his closest friends were Thomas A. Edison and Henry Ford, who were frequent visitors at his cabin.

As a boy, a schoolmate of Jay Gould, Mr. Burroughs formed the ambition to become a naturalist, but the necessity of earning a livelihood forced him to become a teacher in country schools, and later he served as a Treasury clerk and as a bank examiner, although he devoted his spare time to nature study and writing. In 1884 he gave up government work and devoted himself exclusively to the pursuits in which his interests centered. The high character and human touch in his writings won for him many thousands of admirers, and the esteem in which he was held was attested by honorary degrees from Yale and Colgate, and the awarding to him in 1917 of the medal of the American Academy of Arts and Letters for distinguished achievement in arts and letters.

British Miners Strike

COAL mining has come to a virtual standstill in Great Britain with the strike of 1,200,000 miners against wage reductions, and the industrial crisis was made more acute by the danger that the National Union of Railwaymen and the Transport Workers Union might join in sympathetic strikes. The railways are to pass out of government control in August, and the expectation that there then will be an attempt to lower railway wages also has caused these allied unions to believe they might as well make common cause with the miners. Mass meetings of these unions held in various parts of the country pledged full support to the miners.

The government met the strike with a royal proclamation declaring Great Britain to be in a "state of emergency," the first time such a proclamation has been issued in an industrial crisis. This enabled the government to apply certain measures which were enacted last October when a mining strike was threatened—measures which union leaders bitterly opposed.

The unions called out the pump men and other workers who in previous strikes have remained on duty in order to prevent the mines being flooded. Some of the pump men refused to leave their posts, and desperate efforts were made to obtain volunteer crews for the pumps, but there was danger that many of the mines might be ruined. The calling out of the pump men was regarded as an effort to intimidate the government into forcing a settlement of the controversy, but the officials refused to yield.

The exportation of coal was stopped at once, a step which caused the placing of large orders in America, and the supplies on hand were used sparingly. There was enough of a stock in the country to enable other industries to continue for a time.

DOMESTIC

NEW YORK ASSEMBLY OUSTS SOCIALIST. The New York Assembly again has ousted a Socialist member, but this time the basis for action was a charge that he was a resident of New Jersey when elected. The case was that of Henry Jager, of Kings county, and the vote was 77 to 62, only one more than the constitutional majority.

EIGHT KILLED IN CHICAGO EXPLOSION. Eight persons, among them two women, were killed and perhaps seventy-five were injured by the explosion of two tons of gunpowder and fireworks stored illegally in a warehouse within the Chicago city limits. Business houses in the block were wrecked and windows in a radius of half a mile were broken.

CHURCH FIGHTS RENT PROFITEERS. An example of the use of church influence for social welfare was the adoption by the Pittsburgh Baptist Ministers' Association of a resolution under which rent profiteers would be expelled from the churches. All ministers were urged to take a prominent part in the fight "to prevent new burdens of greedy extortion being imposed upon the general public."

TAFT MAY BE CHIEF JUSTICE. Washington forecasters have been busy with rumors that Chief Justice Edward Douglass White of the Supreme Court was to resign because of age and failing health—he is 75—and that William Howard Taft was to be his successor. Mr. Taft called at his former residence in the White House, but it was believed to be merely to pay his respects to President Harding.

PROFESSOR EINSTEIN IN AMERICA. Professor Albert Einstein, the German scientist whose "theory of relativity" has caused so much discussion all over the world, has arrived in America to further the Zionist movement.

PACIFIC LINER SUNK. The Pacific Mail steamship Governor went down off Point Wilson on the west coast after being rammed by the Shipping Board freighter West Hartland. Ten persons were missing.

METHODIST CONFERENCE ADMITS LAYMEN. The New York Methodist Conference, meeting at Cornwall, voted by 103 to 25, to admit laymen into the annual Methodist conference. The action was taken on a memorial from the General Methodist Conference, and two-thirds of the annual conferences must vote in favor of the plan to make it effective.

FOREIGN

GERMANY RELEASES BERGDOLL PRISONERS. The jail sentences of the two Americans who attempted to seize Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, American draft evader, have been remitted by the Baden government and they have been permitted to return to the American occupied zone at Coblenz. This action was taken at the request of the Berlin government after Brigadier-General H. T. Allen of the United States Army had made representations to Berlin.

TURKS PUT UP HARD FIGHT. The Greek offensive in Asia Minor has resulted in a considerable advance all along the line, but after capturing Eski-Shehr, an important city at the junction of the railroad to Angora, they were driven back by a counter-attack in which the Turkish Nationalists claimed the capture of a Greek division.

CATHOLIC CHOSEN TO BE IRISH VICE-ROY. Lord Edmund Talbot has been chosen to succeed Viscount French as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and his first important act will be to summon the two parliaments of North and South Ireland, elections for which are to be held in May. He is the leading lay Roman Catholic in the United Kingdom and the first of his church to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Every Reader of CHRISTIAN HERALD should read this—

From Leslie's Weekly February 10th issue

"... Each person, therefore, might well entrust a reasonable portion of his funds to a savings bank. But there is a limit in this matter, beyond which it is not wise, and certainly not profitable for thrifty persons to go.

"For how does the savings bank make the profits which enable it to meet current expenses and to pay interest to depositors? Aside from loans on real estate, the bank invests the deposits of its clients in sound and dependable securities. Many States have enacted laws specifying bonds of the best class which—and no other—may legally be bought by savings banks. The yield on these investments is larger than that allowed by a bank to its depositors.

"Now, it is not necessary for any man or woman to accept the low rate of savings bank interest. It is possible for any depositor to buy just such securities as the bank does and to get as high a return on his purchases. Even those with small means, having no capital except their savings, may avail themselves of this opportunity by paying a moderate sum down and the remainder in monthly instalments. In this way the investor puts himself in the place of the bank. The deal is as safe for him as it is for the bank. The latter depends on the soundness of its investments for its success. If any link is weak, there is no strength in the entire chain. If first class bonds are not safe, then the bank is not safe."

7% Miller Mortgage Bonds Are as Well Safeguarded as Any Security Held by a Savings Bank

To invest in these Bonds is as safe and easy as depositing your money in the savings bank. You receive a full 7% interest on your money, payable twice yearly. No Miller investor has ever lost a dollar.

Questions and Answers

MRS. C. M. C., Centerville, S. D., referring to the efforts that are now being made in many quarters to secure world-peace, writes: "The Scripture declaration in I Thess. 5: 1-3 has been called by students of prophecy: 'The Peace and Safety Cry.' We hear much, these days, about disarmament and universal peace. Some go so far as to say the Bible teaches that wars shall cease in this present age, and quote Isa. 2: 4. During the administration of President Taft, steps were taken looking to a world-wide peace era; and under the administration of President Wilson, with Mr. Bryan as Secretary of State, treaties were made and signed by some thirty countries and nations to this end, and as a souvenir, Mr. Bryan gave paper-weights in the form of ploughshares, made from used swords, with the inscription on it, 'They shall beat their swords into ploughshares'. Not long after, as a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, came the declaration of war, which precipitated our country into the most terrible conflict in history. What we ought to realize is, that the key to peace is not in the hand of any earthly government or human power, but in the hand of Christ, the Prince of Peace, and that none else has power to bestow permanent and lasting peace on the world. When Jesus the Prince of Peace comes to set up His Kingdom on earth, then and not till then, can we expect wars to cease."

A subscriber has asked us to try to find for him "Missing Links," by Rev. Morton W. Spencer, published by the author at St. Augustine, Florida, 1895, 2 volumes, 12 mo. cloth. If you have a copy for sale, please address Book Department, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Reader, Neff's Mills, Pa. You should make the matter a subject of careful, conscientious study and earnest prayer before deciding which step you ought to take. Gospel work at home needs help, and we cannot see how you could justify neglect of your church's support. Talk it over with your pastor.

H. L. T., Two Dot, Mont. The book, "After Death, What?" was written by Rev. Madison C. Peters and published by the Christian Herald. The author passed away several years ago.

Miss E. G. McC., Ellensburg, Wash., writes: "I am praying and hoping to live to see the day when men will lead all their codes of law with the ten commandments. If the commandments are learned and practiced, then I think all would be well."

We must not forget that Jesus emphasized the Decalogue with a new interpretation: "That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." Love to God and to our fellowmen He showed to be the foundation of the law. Yet so far had this been forgotten, that His restatement came with the force of a new revelation: What we need today is the spirit of Christ in our hearts and lives. Then, but not before, will we be able to live at peace with one another.

"An Old Reader of the Herald" sends in this letter which many will find interesting and suggestive at the present time: "In our day of great problems, it is well to be reminded that there are very few difficulties in the line of human experience that have not happened before. History repeats itself, and this applies not only to events in the realms of war, commerce, legislation, but to most of the conclusions of philosophy as well. That admirable writer and clear thinker, P. Whitwell Wilson, author of 'The Christ We Forget' and other notable religious books, makes the point that it would be an excellent idea for all who are occupied with public affairs to keep in touch with history and especially with the Bible. There are plenty who take their daily portion of Scripture, but comparatively few who continue the practice until they learn to apply it. He reminds us that many of those who have made the deepest impressions upon the minds of their time have been earnest students of the Bible. They have found in its pages their inspiration and influence, and not only this, but they have found unsuspected parallels, which have been most helpful to them in dealing with the subjects of industrialism, commerce, national extravagance, wrangles between labor and capital, strikes, food control and profiteering. One of the earliest strikes recorded, he tells us, was where the Hebrew bricklayers were oppressed in Egypt, the result of which was the first national walk-out—the Exodus—the difference between this and most modern strikes being that the oppressed people had cried to God for wisdom and guidance. 'Does anyone suppose,' Mr. Wilson asks, 'that strikes would be so frequent if capital and labor were led by men who had together examined the Biblical story of the Exodus from Egypt?'"

The Famous Christian Herald RED LETTER BIBLES

Four Styles

Real India and American Bible Paper

We know that we have always priced our Bibles far below other Bibles, and continue to give the best value.

We have in stock our famous red-letter Bibles in four styles as described below.

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.

2. In the New Testament the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.

3. A Red Star (*) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

This test proves that Durham dyes put wear in hosiery

Try to tear a Durable-DURHAM stocking or sock. It can't be done—not with all the strength of your two hands. Pull it crosswise or lengthwise—it makes no difference. Even where the top is knit to the rest of the leg it will resist your hardest tugs.

Does your Hosiery start to decay before you have worn it?

SOME hosiery is partly worn out when you buy it. This is because the usual method of dyeing hosiery "scorches" the fabric, makes it brittle, and breaks down its strength and wearing quality.

Such hosiery develops early "garter runs"—wears out prematurely at toes and heels—develops small holes wherever a shoe rubs or pinches the fabric—as, for instance, at the ankle—and sometimes even the top of the stocking pulls away from the rest of the leg when you are putting it on.

Most people have experienced some one or more of these faults of hosiery.

In offering Durable-DURHAM Hosiery to the public several years ago, we made continued experiments to discover why most hosiery wears out so quickly. We found that it was largely due to the prevalent dyeing process.

The result was that we perfected an exclusive dyeing process which preserves the original strength of the fabric—and increases the life of hosiery.

Starting with a small business we have become in a few years the largest manufacturers of hosiery in the world. And one of the reasons is because Durham dyes put longer wear in Durham hosiery.

Another reason is this: all hosiery is reinforced in places, but Durable-DUR-HAM is doubly reinforced at all points of hardest wear. You need only wear a pair of Durable-DURHAM stockings or socks—silk, mercerized or cotton—and you will realize why it is the largest selling brand in the world.

Note the prices quoted here. Get Durable-DURHAM for the whole family.

In Mexico Today

BETWEEN the hovel of sun-dried bricks which is the home of the barefoot Mexican peon and the cathedral in Mexico City, one of the largest and most magnificent ecclesiastical structures in the Americas, there is a great abyss. The cathedral was begun in 1573 and stands on the site of the temple of Huitzilopochtli, the titular god of the Aztecs, but in four centuries the church which it symbolizes has failed to lift the religious instincts of the inert millions of Mexico far from the plane of mere superstition. Freedom from the domination of the Catholic Church has been won and Protestant missions in the last thirty years have furnished one of the important forces for social improvement, but these missions have been all too few for the vast field. The picture in the upper right-hand corner of four urchins gazing through the windows of a Protestant mission in the capital typifies Mexico's great need and the hunger for spiritual uplift. On the opposite page is the first of a series of articles which will analyze present-day conditions in Mexico, with special reference to Christian opportunities.

Mexico's Unplumbed Chasm

A Description of Social Conditions in One of the Most Important Fields Open to American Christians Today

By WALLACE THOMPSON

A BAMBOO hut with a clumsy thatch of grass, a hovel of sun-dried bricks, made, as the Israelites made them, of straw and clay, a shack of unfinished lumber or rotting railway ties topped with a roof of laminated sheet-iron—these are the symbols of the social problem of Mexico. Within them all a dirt floor, a box filled with earth for a brazier, two or three earthenware pots, a metal over which the woman bends at her endless task of grinding meal for the family cakes of unleavened corn, a few rush mats for beds and a tawdry shrine with a dim light before it—the inert millions of Mexico live today as they have lived for a thousand years.

Their minds untutored, their thoughts and desires confined literally to the animal plane, their religious instincts almost entirely superstition, their government the support of rulers upon the vast misery of the lowly, Mexico finds her parallels only in China and in Turkey. And Mexico is at our own door!

Up until ten years ago the aristocracy of Mexico counted in its make-up many able men, groups of able men, devoted as far as their lights led them, to a paternalistic care of the Indians and peons. Under Diaz there was, in addition, a slow building of a material civilization, looking, in the future, to the filling of the peon stomach and the lifting of the peon mind through education. It has been the common usage, in this past decade since Diaz fell, to excoriate that aristocracy, to blame it for all the evils of the country, to point with bitter scorn at its wealth, at its material monuments of churches and palaces and railways. And yet, although these ten years of revolutions have been devoted most effectively to the elimination of the Mexican upper classes and of their materialism and its monuments, the conditions of the lower classes has not been alleviated by one tiny burden, nor have they been lifted by one hair's-breadth.

The Mexicans of today are worse off than they were in the days of Diaz: they are worse off than in that wild revolutionary period before Diaz; I am not so sure that they are not in worse condition than they were under the Spaniards, for they seem literally to be sliding back to an era like only to that misery which was theirs before the Spaniards and the Jesuits came.

WE LOSE sight of the essential fact of Mexico if we lose sight for one moment of the problem of the lowest of the Mexican people. Personally, I do not know what the Roman Catholic Church might have done if it had had different, more evangelical ideals, but I do know that, save for the work of the Protestant missions in the past thirty years, hardly any other force but Rome has done anything for social improvement in Mexico. I do not know what an Anglo-Saxon leadership would have done in the place of that of the Spaniards and higher mixed-bloods, but I do know that under the Spanish viceroys and under Diaz (a true friend of Protestant missions) more was done toward improving the material welfare and toward building the foundations of material and moral prosperity for the unfortunate peons than has been done or even sincerely attempted in the ten years of revolutionary rule since the fall of Diaz.

Now, Mexico has been, and indeed is, what we sometimes call in our brusque Americanism, a "white man's country." It is one of the spots in this world where the burden of uplift is essentially the white man's burden. For 400 years white Spaniards have sought to lift it, and in that long effort, with all its failures, they have placed Mexico, even with her six millions of unlettered, superstitious Indians, in the category of the white lands. The duty of the white man has ever been two-fold, and its duality has been its power; we have lifted the material plane of our wards and we have upraised those wards themselves to a higher and yet higher mental and spiritual plane.

IT IS this dual duty that the revolutionists of Mexico have shirked and have scouted. The economic ruin of the country is today almost complete, and its spiritual uplift has been halted as by a wall of flame. From those material ruins Mexico might conceivably rise in a spiritual rebirth, but the fact has been otherwise, for the material ruin has been accomplished by the prostitution of all the ideals, all the sacred faiths of men, concentrated by self-seeking bandit governments to the aggrandizement and the enrichment of a few sordid favorites.

I would, if I could, paint a different picture, but the high lights of such a panorama can be added only after the dull background has been set in. And that background is dark indeed. The panorama of misery begins when one crosses the northern border today. There the scattered but once almost happy villages of other times have been replaced by ruined, roofless railway stations lined with starving vendors of food who fight with the bony dogs for the refuse of the very food they sell. All the long trip to Mexico City is marked by the same voiceless suffering, and the capital itself has a dismal dinginess that cries of hopeless misery, in appalling contrast to the pleasanter days of the Diaz "materialism."

The unhappy toll of war and revolution, one says? Yes, in part, for such "war" as Mexico has known always takes that toll and always, too, from the weaklings, putting starvation and sickness and filth and dismay where once were comfort and health and some cleanliness and happiness.

But, again the question, was it not worth the price, will it not be worth the price, in the victories won for human freedom? And here the answer is unequivocally "No."

Many hoped, with the fine faith of their own sincerity, that the upheaval that followed Diaz was the dawning of a new era. But in that hope even those who knew Mexico forgot the Mexicans and their history. Political independence from Spain had been won, freedom from the domination of the Catholic Church had been won, before Diaz came. The struggle of his day was one of uplift, carried on with faulty tools, perhaps, but slowly reaching toward the light. Living was improving, slowly; religion was improving, slowly; education was advancing, slowly. Then came a period of crystallization; the Diaz oligarchy grew old. Many sincere men, inside and outside Mexico, thought that the advance could and should move more rapidly. Diaz held back these hastening reformers, and the spiritual force that finally broke forth into the Madero revolution of 1910-11 was undoubtedly the result of that repression of progressive thought.

Like all the revolutions of Mexico's stormy history, this one began with a beautiful stating of ideals and unrealized needs of the common man; but as with all those other revolutions, the power passed quickly to the hands of those whose sole "ideal" was personal aggrandizement, personal wealth, and ruin to all whose needs might incommode these exalted "leaders."

THE so-called "social revolution" of Mexico has become, literally, a tempest in a teapot, with the miserable masses of the country serving but as tinder and fuel beneath the vessel. The teapot is the diminutive labor world of Mexico, and that indeed is boiling madly. Today, the "advanced" ideas of Mexico serve, in the name of socialism, only to put sweeping power in the hands of untrained

THIS is the first of three articles which Mr. Thompson is writing for the Christian Herald, as a result of his recent trip to Mexico. The others will treat of educational conditions and the work of the missions in Mexico today. Mr. Thompson, in addition to articles in leading magazines, is the author of "The People of Mexico," one of the most authoritative and best documented works on the Mexican subject which has appeared recently.

men, men who know nothing of the responsibilities of power, and are using it only to the destruction of the very bases of Mexican society.

Thus, while there seems to be a light dawning in the labor world of Mexico, I am not sure that the light does not come from the burning of something which Mexico cannot afford to lose. In that industrial labor world there are but 300,000 workers out of a population of 15,000,000, while there are more than 3,000,000 peons, heads of families, who work, when there is work, in the fields or as common laborers. It is upon the continued, unbroken suffering of these 3,000,000 that the 300,000 profit today—the peons have but changed masters once again and in the name of freedom, now, serve a vaster company. The Mexican leaders, drawing their power in turn from the coherent, organized industrial workers, are today destroying the civilization of Diaz, and with it the civilization of American business men. American teachers and American missionaries, which was indeed the hope of the down-trodden majority.

The "modern" laws which labor has promulgated might perhaps fit the advanced industrial life of Germany or of the United States, but they are utterly suicidal to Mexico. They provide six- or eight-hour days, for men who cannot read and who have no touch of intellectual life. They provide minimum wages, to be determined by factory committees, with the most ignorant workmen in the world on a par with employers and industrial engineers. They provide against discharge for any cause except proven drunkenness, in a land where, to say the least, drunkenness is relative.

Their own people have begun, a little, to wonder at the wisdom of these sweeping changes, and one, Ing. Carlos Arroyo, not long ago wrote in the official but very radical "Bulletin of Industry, Commerce and Labor" that there were four main difficulties which would have to be corrected before factory efficiency could be arranged in Mexico on a co-operative basis: first, scientific method would have to replace the empirical systems now in use; second, there would have to be special training for apprentices; third, there would have to be study of employees to have them properly placed; fourth, the responsibility for the tasks assigned would have to be "equally" divided (not given entirely to the workers) between the management and the workers, "because the former continues to be charged with responsibility for the competence of the latter."

AND as to that competence, this same Bulletin regularly publishes the records of accidents. There one will find that in 1918, for instance, there were, in 278 industrial establishments having 292,364 employees, 6,424 accidents, in which 184 were killed, and 42 maimed and 6,198 wounded. And, most illuminating of all, 5,165 of the accidents were admittedly due to the "carelessness of workmen," only 195 were the fault of the management and 1,064 were due to unavoidable causes.

As to the value of the achieved reforms, I have but this to tell: In all the cities, in the centers of industry like the Tampico oil fields and the busy port of Vera Cruz (busier today than it has ever been because all Mexico must live on imported goods) I found a sullen hatred of the foreigner, an ugly self-assertion that bodes but ill for those mission workers to whom we look for so much of the future regeneration of the country. I saw none of the contented, happy calm of prosperous laborers, but only the unrest of the great cities of other lands, ugly with resentment, fertile field for revolution, but not for steady progress. And yet those very resentful workers, convinced of an unappreciated importance which they know but by rote, are all that there is of the "fruits" of the "social revolution" in Mexico.

No, Mexico has not changed, even amongst her petted laboring classes, and I fear that the old rule of our ancient Christian civilization will have to persist a little longer, and the long, dim road be trod again through failure and reform, and failure again and yet again. I fear that we shall still have to lift by reaching down and, by training the dull forces of those dull minds, teach them to help themselves and to climb by themselves.

OUT on the plantations which I visited the workers are going the rounds that they have covered since Mexico began, and in the fairs I saw the only evidence of happiness that smiled on me in the length and breadth of the country. The market-places and the fairs of Mexico, sunny, crowded, colorful, rich, because the Indians in the booths are close to Nature and Nature's bounty! That simple happiness has been the source of all Mexico's joy—and of all her misfortune. That simplicity has made her people the dupes of predatory chieftains and hideous priests of pre-Spanish times, of Spaniard and priest through the long centuries of the viceroys, of master and priest, too, through the years since the Independence. Yet in those periods those who have duped the Indians have, most of them, protected the Indians in an easy, medieval way, and slowly there has grown a civilization, and in that civilization have been nurtured the seeds of better things.

Misery untold stalks incoherently in rags and filth. In the markets wretched food can be bought from the very mouths of hungry vendors

The time was coming for those seeds to bear fruit, when, hastening the ripening, came the revolutions of 1910 and after. It was like the child who pulled up the stalks to see how the seeds were growing—they were growing much faster than appeared on the surface, but—they did not grow after they were pulled up.

Looking back to the Diaz day we can find, for instance, the slow, constructive work toward the creation of arable land for small farms. It was being hampered somewhat by grasping officeholders, but it was advancing a great national plan of irrigation to make possible the use of small tracts in a country where rain conditions have forever made small farming all but impossible. Then the revolution and the resounding cry for "Land." The alleged land hunger of the Mexican Indians and peons has been at once the rallying cry for each succeeding revolution and the one appeal of all of them for foreign sympathy.

But whatever authorities may conceive as to the facts of the existence of this land hunger or of the forms which it takes—a desire for little farms, for prehistoric communal ownership, or for property only because it is wealth and can be converted into cash—it is also true that the schemes of the revolutionists for land distribution have been impossible except by the confiscation of rich properties and the destruction of vested rights. No land that is not tillable is satisfactory for distribution, obviously, and the possibly, tillable land of Mexico is, in all, actually only about 25,000,000 acres, or one-twentieth of the area of the country. Land distribution must long remain largely a beautiful theory, good only for raising up the natives by direct appeal to their bitter poverty or to their human greed, and for the raising up of foreign sympathy by the flaunting of the misfortunes of the soil under more appealing names.

In Mexico today all these dreams of land distribution have gone the way of other "reforms" for the benefit of the peons. Nothing, virtually, has been done. Some great properties have been confiscated, or "paid for" in unguaranteed bonds of bankrupt state governments, but most of such properties are today in the hands of former revolutionary "generals." Some few have been distributed to Indians, but even these tracts are taken with but scant enthusiasm, one great "land distribution" in Yucatan calling forth a crowd of 6,000 to the festival (all Mexico goes to any fiesta) but only thirty Indians took up any of the hundreds of small tracts offered.

THESE essential facts of the Mexican situation are patent to all who go to Mexico today, and they are inescapable to those who have a background of knowledge of Mexico by which to judge of what they see. And yet it is true that in the councils of Carranza, in the entourages of de la Huerta and now of Obregon there have been and are men representing forces which we in our time have felt could not be used to evil purpose. These were men who had been stirred by the fine frenzy of the first revolution, and whose ideals, caught as mere phrases by the leaders of revolts, were handed back to their originators again, as the "ideals" of the revolution. Strange, indeed, it is and yet not only newcomers, but foreigners of long residence and sincere and devoted Mexicans as well, fell victims to that subtle flattery. In education, in the Protestant missions, there were such men, their very hopes too great to protect them from the petty deceits of those who climbed to power upon them.

I think I can thus explain why travelers in Mexico, great-hearted Christian clergymen as well as moistly entertained excursions of American "Chambers of Commerce" can be deceived as to conditions there. I have been inclined to be impatient, as a rule, with those who let themselves be led this way and that, and flattered by the apparent sincerity of self-deluding Mexican officials, but Mexico is, after all, an eternal enigma. It is an enigma because its colossal depths of ignorance and the smallness of its deceits are literally incomprehensible to simpler and broader minds.

It is that enigma that I have sought through all my writings on Mexico to resolve. On this last trip through the country, I saw only the eternal Mexico, the Mexico of ignorance and misery, whose only change was that it was a little sadder, a little more resentful of those whom it once regarded as its helpers and its friends.

A most perfect example of this ability of the Mexican of the "modern" type (though it is in reality a thoroughly national characteristic) to absorb one's ideas and deceive one by the re-dishing of those ideas happened to me on my last trip to Mexico City. In the course of the preparation of an article on a great business for a popular magazine, I met a Mexican licenciado (a title of vast elegance, meaning much more than its dictionary equivalent of "lawyer") who was extremely anxious to be quoted as an expert on the subject which I was studying. He evidently thought that my quoting him would help him to a government post to which he aspired, so he expounded his ideas at great length.

When he was finished, I answered his arguments in kind, and with considerable interest in his response to my counter-play. He was pleasantly combative, and we parted in thorough friendship. It was only a few hours later that I had an urgent call from this same gentleman, who had, he told me, been going into new material on the subject and wished to express his views, as stated in the morning, more definitely to me. Whereupon he returned me, recooked and eloquently served, my own friendly contentions of the previous interview! It was a bit thick for me, but it is worth the telling that an American business man of long experience in Mexico who had introduced this Mexican to me remarked when the subject came up: "By the way, Licenciado Blank is getting much broader. He has figured out a pretty decent attitude on this problem. . . . and redished me my own views again!"

This is Mexico today. On the top a group of men, less able even than those who surrounded Carranza

Can We Advertise Christianity?

A Discussion of Ways to Spread the Church's Message

By H. BERTRAM LEWIS

IN THE Christian Herald of September 4, 1920, appeared an able contribution by Mr. Anderson Pace entitled "Can We Advertise Christianity?" Mr. Pace preaches sound principles of organization and publicity which are practically certain to increase the attendance of the individual church which applies them.

My approach to the subject of advertising Christianity is along more general lines, for it is a conviction of mine of many years standing that the church as a whole is missing its greatest opportunity in this busy age by failing to preach its essential message through the mediums to which the masses of the people have become accustomed to turn for their daily pabulum of thought.

How can the Christian Gospel hope to touch a majority of the people when it is not taught in places where the people—or rather the minds of the people—collect? In this nation of approximately 107,000,000 souls, there are some 42,000,000 professing Christians, both Protestant and Catholic, and probably 21,000,000 children of professing Christians below the normal age for church membership, a total of 63,000,000, or slightly less than fifty-nine per cent. of the total population. And of the aggregate church membership (and presumably of its children) not more than half is regular in its attendance, which means that 29½ per cent. of the people of the United States come regularly under the influence of church or Sabbath school. The other 70½ per cent. are either indifferent or wholly out of touch.

Obviously, then, a very great majority are not being reached by the preaching in our churches. There are not church buildings enough in the land to accommodate half the present churchless ones if they should be suddenly inspired to come in. So unless religious thought is brought into the current of their lives through some other channel it is not going to enter those lives at all.

From the standpoint of the layman who rubs shoulders daily with many men and women who seldom enter churches, the neglected and unharnessed good in the human soul—collectively speaking—would be the most distressing thing in the world to contemplate if it were not also the most inspiring. If ever the fields were "white to harvest" it is now. Literally millions of persons in every Christian land are going through an experience of spiritual starvation because no voice arrests their daily pursuit of material objects to cry, "Stop. Think. There are higher things than these." And no one who profits by their many splendid impulses, or notes their fine contempt for cant, or senses their longing for and willingness to work self-sacrificingly towards a better social order, can fail to conclude that all they need is the rallying appeal of the simple Christianity of Christ to make every church in the land hum with a spiritual life beyond all precedent.

FUNDAMENTALLY the present trouble with society is the speed of life and its effect upon the human mind. Personal responsibility is not lessened by the fact that we are living like dervishes, but judgment of the individual rests with God and the concrete problem before the church is not to apportion the blame for the average man's neglect of spiritual things but to seek the remedy. And the fact is that men's minds are influenced by repeated impressions. The suggestions most often repeated become the basis of their thoughts, and by the psychological law of averages a man has no chance to think first of his religion where nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand mental impressions he receives are strictly materialistic in their suggestion.

The average American today reads the newspapers and the cheaper magazines. He reads some fiction—proportionately very little. He reads no philosophy. He lives under the heavy pressure of material things. He talks of his business and of the hobbies of his relaxation. For an evening's diversion he plays bridge or goes to the movies. He eats. He sleeps. What chance has religion under this routine? Where can it slip in and touch that racing dynamo to which the senses carry their impulses and from which come the reactions that mold his life?

Get him to church once a week and at least you light a backfire in his overcrowded mind. Without that restraint his brain goes throbbing on its way, growing more and more absorbed every day by the tangible things that make their daily impress and less and less receptive to spiritual stimuli of any kind.

Speaking in practical terms there seem to be just four ways of increasing church attendance: 1. By the organized efforts of individual churches, such as Mr. Pace has described; 2. By substituting for the traditional church service a service of more popular appeal; 3. By reaching out into the subconscious mind of the mass and mingling impressions of Christian thought with its multitudinous daily impressions of materialistic thought and counting upon the proven laws of psychology to work their inevitable effect; 4. By combining any or all of these plans.

HOW far the scattered efforts of individual churches can be permanently effective is a question. Each such campaign will be effective according to the ability and energy with which it is carried out. It will continue to be effective according to the stickativeness of the congregation behind it. But in such work there will be as many degrees of ability, energy and stickativeness as there are churches, and even if every church could be persuaded to organize such a campaign—which is almost unthinkable—the combined result would be disappointing because the pressure would be so unequally applied.

The second method will generally result in a temporary increase of attendance but without an increase of spirituality. It is perhaps possible to devise a service both popular and spiritual, but the average service of popular character is nothing but a compromise, a concession to the materialism of the masses which even the average attendant—who is there for no purpose much higher than to be entertained at no cost

MR. LEWIS, in this article "Can We Advertise Christianity?" presents a point of view concerning which opinions will widely differ. Before we decided to publish it, we sent it to a small group of men and women and asked them to express their frank opinions, not only as to the feasibility of Mr. Lewis' plan, but also as to its desirability.

On page 311 you will find a summary of these opinions. The article is presented not as an expression of the Christian Herald but, frankly, for the purpose of arousing some discussion on the whole problem of Church advertising.

We will be glad to receive any comments that may come into your mind.

to himself—recognizes as a confession of weakness by the church, a lack of confidence in the appeal of its true message.

Naturally he is not drawn up to the spiritual level of the church. On the contrary the church has lowered its spiritual level, to his and while he is not the man to refuse a "free show," nor to express a lessened respect for the church while he accepts its hospitality, he is at heart farther away than ever from becoming a consecrated Christian, because of a vague contempt for an institution so dubious of its own strength as to fall back upon such expedients as give to the public place of amusement its popularity.

But the third method is not open to the objection of uneven pressure or of doubtful spirituality. The church can speak daily, weekly, or monthly as it elects to the masses through mediums that are certain to reach them and in a spirit and a language which compromise nothing. It has avenues of approach almost without number to the minds and hearts both of men and women. No subject under the shining sun admits of so many convincing presentations. No advocate ever had such a wonderful variety of appeals to his audience. Nearly every problem of human life is a legitimate subject for the church to use in demonstrating the power, influence, and indispensability of the Christian spirit.

WHAT follows relates wholly to this method and at the outset I shall try to make the conception perfectly clear.

It is, briefly, to conduct a nation-wide advertising campaign consisting of messages to the people from the church. The possible subjects of these messages would be almost infinite in number and variety, but the actual subjects should be chosen according to the times.

If, for example, such a campaign should begin today, the subjects uppermost in men's minds at this time would logically form the basis of it, and the method of treatment would be to illustrate in practical terms the true expression of the Christian spirit in these affairs of current interest and to contrast this with the well-known fruits of selfishness. A simple, dignified, man-to-man presentation. No talking down to the reader. No faintest trace of a "holier-than-thou" point of view, but the unassailable truth so stated that every honest man would have to concede it, and would be impelled to bring it home to himself because of the simplicity and sincerity with which it was stated.

Through every line of it should run an impression of the virility of the message and of the Christ who furnishes its inspiration. These men of the twentieth century should be made to feel the power that caused men of their own practical type in ancient days to utter the awe-struck tribute, "Never man spake like this man."

Of prohibitions or injunctions there should never be a trace. The world is sick of them—and because the average man has associated the church in his mind with the thought of a warning finger and a wagging head, his conception of Christ has come to be of a mournful figure whose message may be summed up in three oppressive words—"Thou shalt not." Yet where do we find the spirit of that phrase in all His teachings?

Content as He was to enunciate great positive truths, the acceptance of which blots out the selfishness that calls forth the negative commands, it must grieve Him indeed to see the true burden of His teachings so perverted in the minds of modern men. And only as we apply His method can we hope to make Him grip the hearts of the present generation.

SOME years ago a local advertising campaign was carried on in the Philadelphia newspapers describing in a broad impressive way the function, the achievements, and the influence of the Christian Church; its place in modern society; what men owe to it; why it deserves their support and how they may support it. The thing was splendidly done and I have always understood that it filled the churches of Philadelphia as no amount of individual effort by the churches had ever been able to do.

The Philadelphia treatment would form another excellent phase of a national campaign, and there are almost as many other possible phases as there are possible topics of thought under the sun.

For the Word of God enters into every nook and cranny of life. It applies to every detail of human existence and if it were taught the people by such means as these they would find themselves and their consciences face to face with it every day.

The subconscious mind of man cannot resist that kind of pressure, as every advertising psychologist well knows. Keep any thought before the masses persistently enough and slowly but surely it becomes a matter of acceptance by the majority. The American people could not escape the Christian religion if it were thus presented. Even if their wills were opposed—which they are not by any means—the inexorable laws of psychology would have their way.

How subversive of the present evil order this campaign would be would depend wholly upon the sympathy and inspiration behind the preparation of it, and the power of its appeal. Well done, its effect would be instantly arresting, and rapidly convincing. If it were undertaken by the combined churches with wholehearted confidence in its possibilities, a purpose to make it a paramount function of church effort and not a mere passing phase, and an appropriation large enough to bring its influence promptly into every corner of the land, a campaign with the right ring throughout would make almost unbelievable headway. It would do more than fill up the churches—it would fill up the hearts of a majority of men with contrition and charity. It would be the quickest, surest antidote for the evil and disruptive doctrines of the day that could possibly be devised.

And—perhaps the most important result of all—it would multiply recruits for the ministry and vastly improve their personnel. Within two years of the inauguration of such a campaign we would cease to ask ourselves where the ministers of the future are coming from. We should find them coming in increasing numbers from all sections of the country and from all walks of life. But let it be said right here—and with all the emphasis that words can express—that unless these messages of the Christian Church partake of the deepest conviction, the highest spirituality, the keenest common sense and the most profound knowledge of human nature, they will fail and fail miserably. This forecast of results is postulated upon a campaign soundly conceived, powerfully executed and unrelentingly maintained.

AND it is high time we were about it. Every thought but the thought of Christ is clamoring through the columns of the daily press. Some are wholesome, many are demoralizing—but how often do you see the Master's name appear? What is there in the secular periodical that makes Him live before its readers? Next to nothing. On the contrary, every new and destructive ism of the age is bulletined about until the man on the street either accepts one of them or accepts nothing. One rival gospel cancels another in the minds of many and they neither know nor care what they think about any of them, Christianity included.

Unless, above the din, our world soon begins to hear the majestic tones of Authority, speaking a simple,

Doors of Opportunity

TRUE to their long-established record of doing nothing by halves, the readers of the Christian Herald have again demonstrated their philanthropic efficiency in a very remarkable scale. In the last issue of January, we invited them to become patrons of the Jerusalem Orphanage, and at the same time we presented the photographs of thirty-six little maids who were candidates for support. There was still another, but on account of sickness, her portrait was not available at the time. We are now able to announce that patrons have been found for the entire list of orphans, even including the absentee.

This new "door of opportunity" is one of many that have been providentially opened for the Christian Herald Family Circle. We recall the India orphan door, which that great servant of God, Bishop Thoburn, helped to open, and passing through which, our friends found an abundant field for service, ultimately over 5,000 little orphan waifs being gathered into missionary folds and distributed among sixty orphanages, under the auspices of the Christian Herald. Then there was the door which was afterwards thrown wide open in Japan, when 800 to 900 orphans and half-orphans, bereaved by the famine in the three northeastern provinces, were gathered into orphanages, three of the largest of which have become a permanent work. China, too, furnished a similar opportunity when 2,000 orphans were gathered in, many of whom have since grown up into noble and useful manhood and womanhood—some of them trained to preach the Gospel to the unenlightened people of their own land.

And so it has been, wherever our friends have undertaken the work, they have found in many countries an open door inviting their cooperation. Never has the work proved unsatisfactory or unremunerative in the highest sense, resulting in soul-winning in the field and soul and character-building here at home among the interested patrons. The little doorway opened in Palestine gives a glimpse of great possibilities. In a mixed population of many races: Greek, Arab, Jew, Armenian and Moslem, surely there is a divine call in the summons to duty to such a field as this. In these days of quick communication and with skilled workers already in the field, there is the opportunity for every good man and woman here at home to be represented at the Gospel front. You who read this can help this work by becoming a patron of the Jerusalem Orphanage.

Things Better Unsaid.

"MY DEAR friends," said the officiating minister at the funeral of the distinguished citizen of Spotted Town who passed away suddenly last week, "we are met to speak the truth about this poor soul who has gone into the presence of his Maker, and to whom we commit him, without expressing any opinion as to the place where he has gone or where he now is. But this occasion seems a good one, on account of the large number of citizens present who never go to church, to say a few words by way of warning, words spoken without malice, but in truth.

"The deceased has been lauded by the daily press as one of the distinguished citizens of Spotted Town who has amassed a large fortune here, and in a column and a half the paper described his history and told of the political and other offices he had filled, and held him up to the young generation as an example of industry and energy.

"As a matter of fact, speaking the truth, you all know that this man was a profiteer all through the war and at the time of his death. He made his money in ways that God could not approve. He paid as small wages as he could and hold his clerks, and he gave as little to all good causes as he could and retain his reputation as a public-spirited citizen. He was not a member of any church, and this is the only time a minister has ever been called into his home, and then only to assist other organizations at his funeral. He never confessed Christ before men or lived the Master's life or taught it to others. He was selfish, greedy, and non-religious. Few people really mourn his departure and his example is the last thing any young man in Spotted Town ought to imitate. We commit him to the mercy of God. Let us pray."

Of course, the minister did not say anything of the kind. If he had, it would have created a sensation and without doubt have led to a prompt demand for his resignation. And also it may be true that such a funeral address, even if it spoke the exact truth, had better be unsaid. But how many funeral addresses have you heard, Mr. Citizen of Spotted Town, in which you knew that the late deceased was being wafted into a heaven of which he was pitifully ignorant, and praised for good deeds which he had never done, and eulogized as a distinguished fellow citizen when you and every one around you knew perfectly well that the funeral service was a farce, and silence would have been the best way to conduct it?

Reporting Sin

FOR the last three months the press of this country has been giving Old Ultimate Consumer and Tax Payer whole pages of detailed accounts of certain murder and divorce trials.

Murder and divorce are legitimate items of news and the press is justified in reporting them.

But it ought to be done in the right proportion. There are, of course, many Consumers and Tax Payers who want all the ghastly details of murders and filthy suggestions of divorce cases to be served up with the breakfast bacon and eggs and coffee, in the morning, but there are also a good many others who are very tired of the emphasis laid on the details of human sin and sordidness. Why should my morning uplift sheet regale me for two or three weeks with a murder committed in Baraboo or San Diego, when I live in Portland, Oregon, or dish up for my breakfast the salacious bits that go with divorce in high (or low) life in New York when my residence is in Skagway, Alaska?

Human sin ought to be reported as the Bible reports it, giving the cause, and pointing the remedy and making the human transgression abhorrent instead of fascinating. David's murder of Uriah the Hittite and his stealing of Uriah's wife are all told in what would be about three inches in a daily paper, but the effect of it on him and the results as brought out by the prophet Nathan take up a whole page in David's after life.

Yes, report sin, gentlemen of the press, but give it to us by the stickful not the page full.

Cheap Talk

HERE is a sample of the cheap talk that makes up the average conversation of millions of human beings:

"Fine day, isn't it?"

"Yes, fine."

"How are you feeling today?"

"Oh fair. How are you?"

"So, so."

"Some warmer than yesterday, isn't it?"

"Yes, but not so warm as day before yesterday."

"No, not quite. Well, good day."

"Same to you. So long."

In a world that contains so much that is of the most tremendous interest and importance and beauty and power, doesn't it strike you that it borders on a daily tragedy that millions of human beings, many of them gifted with intelligence, should have nothing to say to their acquaintances and friends more than cheap trivialities or dull platitudes? To be sure the weather is always with us, and our "feelings" are always a part of our being, but in the name of Him who made a most interesting world, and put us into it to enjoy it, why do we keep up the silly and empty habit of exchanging question and answer about the same old topics of conversation that the human race has worn out after several centuries of use?

Think of the things worth talking about! The universe is full of them. Instead of using them we indulge in "cheap talk," and the years go by unen-

To the Christian Herald:

East may be East, and West may be West, but the kindness that you have shown us will be carried back by us and will be planted in the hearts of our people.

May the friendships that have thus been formed between the citizens of these two great and noble countries be as shining lights on either side of the Pacific. Inadequate and meaningless as these thoughts may be, they come from the heart of one who loves China and America. I am, livened by any refreshing exchange of ideas even among the people we love and whom we call our friends and neighbors. As one of our good friends said the other day, speaking of a companion whom he had known in business for over twenty years, "I never heard George say an original thing. He always greets me with the same old word,—'Well, Bill, how goes it?' Doing business at the same old stand, eh?" I wonder if he ever thinks of any thing else except business? I wish he would sometimes ask me if the baby has another tooth or tell me something about something else besides business."

It would not be a bad idea to establish a chair of "Interesting Conversation" in our schools and colleges. People do not know how to talk. They talk, but they don't know how. The Professor on Interesting Conversation could start the students on some original tracks and they would be the people we would enjoy meeting at receptions and social gatherings. I get all the weather I want without having it thrown at me in talk. And as for my feelings, perhaps I would not have so many if so many people were not always asking me how I "feel." Say, Professor, when are you going to start that course in Conversation? But I know a lot of people who need it.

Another Tax Puzzle

SPEAKING of puzzles, how about this one?

Ultimate Consumer makes out his income tax according to expert lawyer who charges him $10 for the knowledge of how to do it. One year afterward, he is summoned by an official notice to meet the deputy internal revenue collector at the Federal building and answer certain questions relative to his income tax report as made out a year before. According to the printed notice he receives, the penalty for falsifying an income tax report is $10,000 and several years in jail.

Wondering how soon he will be arrested for some item of perjury in making out report, Old Man Ultimate Consumer hastens to obey summons of deputy collector.

Arrived at the Federal building, he is confronted with the deputy and given the charge against him, as certified in the official mark over against the item, "For repairs and expenses on property," which is,— "Expense of $500 as here stated is too much."

"You will have to explain that," says the deputy.

"Explain what?" anxiously asks Ultimate Consumer.

"The $500."

"Why, I explained that item to the lawyer who made out my report. I had to spend that much to keep my house from falling into ruin. All during the war I was not able to do any building or repairing, and my house was so old that it needed fixing up the worst sort. The plaster was falling off, the floors were rotted through in places. The roof needed reshingling and the whole house painting. I had to make extensive repairs in order to keep my home livable. And on top of everything else, the cost of materials and labor made the expenses twice as great and half as much as the house really needed to make it fit to live in. But where is my crime? What is the penalty?"

The deputy looked grave.

"The crime," he says, "consists in the $500 being put as repairs on a house which you are renting."

"But I stated at the time that the repairs were on my own house in which I am living."

"It was a technical error on the part of the person who made out the report."

"Oh," says Ultimate Consumer, with a sigh of relief. "Then it is something for which I am not to blame!"

"Possibly not," says the collector. "But you will have to pay an additional $23.97 on the $500 repairs on your own home."

Ultimate Consumer heaves another sigh of relief. And takes out his check book. After making out the check for $23.97 he says timidly to the collector,

"May I ask what the extra amount would have been on the $500 for repairs if they had been made on the rented property?"

"In that case," says the collector severely. "There would have been no extra amount to pay the revenue department. Repairs on rented property from which the owner gets some return are exempt from tax."

"But the repairs on a man's own home from which he gets no return except the pleasure of keeping his home from falling into ruin, are taxed?"

"Just so," says the collector. "It is very plain."

"Very," says Ultimate Consumer.

Puzzle: Find out how plain it really is.

Dorinda Finds a Grandmother

A Story

By MARTHA KING DAVIS

Illustrated by M. L. Greer

DORINDA, with utter disregard of beaded Georgette, snuggled deeper in the big arm-chair before the fireplace. Somewhere in the house a clock slowly chimed twelve, and at its last stroke, a door closed gently.

Dorinda straightened. "Come in, Dad. I'm here in the library."

James Hayden stood for a moment in the doorway. He felt a little thrill of gladness at the sight of Dorinda. Always, always, Dorinda brought to him that thrill. He smiled as he shook his head. "What? Not gone to bed yet, snookums? Don't you know that all Cinderellas are supposed to vanish at the magic midnight hour?"

Dorinda went to him and put her strong young arm about his neck; she laid her cheek against his lined one. "Sometimes," she whispered, and her voice caught with a little sob, "sometimes I wish I were a Cinderella."

Her father did not answer. He put her back in the big chair, and sat down by the table.

"Mother—not in yet?"

"No, she stayed on. She sent me home with the Honorable Roswell Dillingham and his mother. Dad," Dorinda raised smouldering eyes, "I am not going to marry the Honorable Roswell Dillingham!"

"Well—you don't have to marry him, do you, Toots?"

"I do if his mother and my mother have their say, and if the H. R. D. has his. Dad!" tragically, "do I look old?"

James Hayden smiled.

"Not—noticeably, my dear. You'll not die of old age right away. Who says you look old?"

"Mother. She fusses at me all the time. You know this is my second season. If I don't get married this year it's 'Goodbye, chance,' she says. As if I cared—!" She leaned over and put her hand on his. "I'd rather stay with you, Dad, always and forever."

He patted her hand gently. "I'm inclined to second the motion. But you just haven't happened to meet the right man. Time enough; you're nothing but a baby. I suppose—I suppose this Dillingham has—money?"

Dorinda nodded vehemently. "You've said it, Dad. Money, blue blood—that's all Mother cares! Oh, forgive me, but what is the use of pretending? I—I'm desperately unhappy. Mother's pushing me to accept him before the eighteenth; she wants to announce it at a dinner she is giving that night. Oh, if I only had some place to go! If I only had a relative, a—a grandmother!"

James Hayden started. The girl saw in his eyes a look she had never seen there before.

"Dorinda," he said quietly, "you have a grandmother."

"Oh, oh, please, Dad, don't joke that way!"

"I'm not joking, my dear, it's quite true."

"Oh—but it isn't! You told me your parents died before I was born."

"They did, but I never told you that your mother's mother was dead."

A little pucker came between the girl's eyes. There was a moment's silence. "No," she said finally, "no. And Mother would never tell me a thing about her life before she met you, though I've asked so many times. But her mother—why, I just took it for granted. Are you sure, Dad?"

"Positive, though I didn't know about her until a few years ago. You see, when we were married your mother gave me to understand that her parents were dead. You said a moment ago that there was no use in pretending. There isn't. You are old enough now to decide things for yourself, uninfluenced."

HE LEANED an arm against the table and shaded his face with his hand. The look in Dorinda's wide, troubled eyes made explanation difficult.

"Your mother came into my office as stenographer. She was very beautiful and I fell in love with her at first sight. Soon after we were married, I realized that wealth and position meant more to her than anything else in the world. But—she gave me you, Dorinda—I never can forget that. We've probably been as congenial as—most couples. One day a young fellow from a little town in northern Massachusetts came to see me. He lived next door to the Lymans, Isabel's parents. He told me of the death of your grandfather. I had a talk with Isabel that night. Seems she left home when she was sixteen, had never written or been back. I guess the old man had been pretty hard with her, but her mother—well, my entreaties were useless. I dropped the matter then and there. I've never spoken to her about it since."

Dorinda's hands were clenched so tightly that all the blood was forced into her finger-tips. "Oh," she cried in a low, stifled voice, "I've always known Mother was selfish, but "Grandmother!" she called "Oh, Grandmother!"

this—oh, Dad, I can't bear it! Haven't you ever been to see grandmother?"

"Why, yes, of course I have, Dorinda. I went right away, and I've been there a good many times since."

The girl's smile was illuminating. "Oh, I might have known! Tell me about her. My grandmother! And I've always wanted one so terribly!" She leaned forward with shining eyes.

"You'll love her, kiddie. She's a regular grandmother, but you'll have to go all the way. She's shy and reserved and proud—her life hasn't been a bed of roses, by any means. I didn't like the idea of her living alone, so I got a neighbor and his wife to go there. It's," he smiled reminiscently, "it's a good place to visit."

"But, Dad!" cried Dorinda in a breaking voice. "Why haven't you told me this before? Why haven't you taken me with you?"

Her father put his hand under her chin and looked deep into her eyes. "I wanted to be absolutely sure that you were a—Hayden."

THERE came the whirr of a motor, a murmur of voices, a merry "Good-night, everybody."

Isabel Hayden came into the room, throwing aside her fur wrap and pulling at her gloves. "I declare, if my devoted family are not sitting up for me! You both look about as cheerful as a funeral. What's the glad news?"

Dorinda shivered. How pretty and graceful her mother was standing there in her black lace evening gown. No wonder her father had fallen in love with her at first sight twenty years ago.

"Mother, Dad's told me about grandmother."

The gloves slipped from her mother's fingers. "Jim!" she cried sharply.

"You must have known that I would tell Dorinda, Isabel."

"Oh, Mother, how could you?"

Isabel Hayden flushed defiantly. "Your father has always had a penchant for making mountains out of mole-hills, Dorinda. In the face of what he has probably told you I can't expect to make you understand. Jim doesn't understand." Her eyes flashed. "My father ground me under an iron heel, and my mother—she was afraid to interfere. I stood it as long as I could and then I got out. I said I'd never set foot inside of that forsaken little town again and I meant it. I never shall."

"Mother! Please don't say that. Dad and I are going to see grandmother. Please, oh, please come with us!"

Mrs. Hayden picked up her gloves and her evening coat and walked to the door. "You and your father can do as you like, Dorinda," she said coldly, "I stay here."

DORINDA, her chin cupped in her hand, gazed out of the car window into the gathering darkness and the swirl of flying snowflakes. It had commenced to snow early in the afternoon and now every passing tree and rail fence and stone wall was hidden under a wondrous blanket of gleaming whiteness.

Dorinda and her father had changed from the fast moving Pullman express to this slow, crowded branch train, whose destination would finally be Brandon, the home of Grandmother Lyman.

Dorinda thought of her mother. How disgusted she would be with this close, ill-smelling day-coach. Dorinda knew now why her father's eyes were always so tired, his face so lined, why he spent so many hours away from home. "And yet," she thought proudly, "I've never heard him speak one unkind word to Mother, or deny her one small thing."

She swallowed a lump in her throat. Only a little time now and they would be in Brandon. What would her grandmother be like? She felt a quick thrill of excited anticipation. Her father spoke.

"Mighty lot of snow up this way, kiddie. If we can't get a conveyance at the station—better have let me written of our coming, Dorinda."

"Oh, no, Dad, that would have spoiled all the fun."

He shook his head doubtfully. "You won't call it fun if we have to walk a mile in this young blizzard. Ah, here we are!"

The train came to a jerky stop. Brandon! Dorinda buttoned the collar of her fur coat tightly and held her muff before her face as she followed her father down the car steps to the snow-covered platform.

"Here, Dorinda, you wait here, while I see about some kind of a rig."

The small waiting-room smelled chokingly of coal gas and smoking kerosene lamps. The few people gathered about the big stove eyed Dorinda curiously.

A few moments, and her father came in, his face wreathed in smiles. "Of all the luck!" he exclaimed, "Here's Keith Dundan, Dorinda."

The girl found her hand held firmly in a warm, hearty clasp. She gazed up a long, fur overcoat with melting snow crystals, to a pair of merry, blue eyes.

"Miss Dorinda! Why, of course, I'd have known you anywhere!" He smiled at James Hayden. "The last photograph was a splendid likeness."

"What?" gasped Dorinda.

"Keith lives right beside your grandmother. If it hadn't have been for Keith, I'd never have known—!" Hayden broke off abruptly. "He came down to meet an uncle who hasn't arrived. Sorry."

The Soul-Life of a Nation

A Sermon by REV. BENJAMIN COX*

TEXT—Mark 8:36. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

I DO not feel that we do violence to the real meaning of the text if we read it: "What shall it profit America though she gain the whole world and lose her own soul?" America's great need today is soul emphasis. The real prosperity of our country is founded on religion and is fostered by religion.

William Jennings Bryan, speaking in Little Rock to a great throng of men, said among other things: "Gentlemen, some of you may think slightly of churches; but I notice that you do not buy real estate where there are no churches." It made quite an impression upon me at the time. As a member of the Board of Trade in Little Rock for twelve years, and of the Chamber of Commerce in Memphis for eight years, I have taken the position that the chief commercial asset of any city is its churches.

A prominent American was visiting Argentina. The President of the Republic asked him: "Why has South America gotten on so poorly, and North America so well?" The visitor replied: "What do you think is the reason?" "I think the reason is found in the fact," the President said, "that the Spaniards came to South America seeking gold, while the Pilgrim Fathers came to North America seeking God." There is a great deal of truth in this view. I am sorry to say that North America today does not place God first and gold second, as the Pilgrim Fathers did. Just to the extent that she follows South America in placing gold first and God second, to that extent will North America deteriorate. The prominent visitor to Argentina of whom I speak was Roger W. Babson, who is perhaps the greatest commercial-industrial statistician in the world today. In his striking book, "The Fundamentals of Prosperity," Mr. Babson issues a wonderful call to America to pay more attention to the soul life of the country. He writes: "It is the Church which has created America, developed our schools, created our homes, built our cities, done everything that is worth while in America." Further he remarks: "The need of the hour is not more legislation; the need of the hour is more religion."

More religion is needed everywhere, from the halls of Congress at Washington to the factories, the mines, the fields and the forests. It is one thing to talk about plans or policies, but a plan or policy without a religious motive is like a watch without a spring, or a body without the breath of life. In my judgment, one of the greatest problems with America is the fact that we are trying to hatch chickens from sterile eggs. America's need is to pay more attention to the real germ of life—the soul life of the country.

Business men were packed to the doors in a great auditorium in one of our cities, not long since. A business man, not a preacher, was on the platform, and was answering the question: "What is the matter with business?" In answering this important question this business man—and remember, he was not a preacher—said: "Business is out of joint because business men are leaving God out of account." Anything that leaves God out of account will surely be out of joint.

THIS call to America to pay more attention to the soul life of the country is coming from many quarters. I was interested in the bold heading of an article in a February magazine entitled "Taking Sin Out of Business." The three letters "sin" in the middle of "business" is underlined heavily. I have been such a dullard heretofore that, until I saw these three letters underlined, I never realized the word "sin" occurs in the middle of "business." The great need of America is, as far as possible, to take the sin out of business. We need a return to the ideals of business life Abraham Lincoln had. You remember that by mistake he had given a customer one day half a pound of tea short and after closing hours that night he walked seven miles to his customer's house with the half-pound of tea. He knew he could not sleep if he did not restore the tea.

It is not material development that will make America great. We hear a great hue and cry "What is it that we need?" "Higher wages, better houses, a plan for the people to own their homes," some say; "if we have these things we will be all right." It is not true. We may have all of these things and yet be all wrong. A woman came into my office the other day and said: "I want to see you a few minutes privately." I closed the door, and very earnestly she proceeded to tell me that she thought the great need of America was for people to own their own homes. She said: "Don't you think that would be wonderful? Don't you think that would be a good thing?" I said "Certainly I do." "Well," she said, "why can not Central Baptist church buy several acres of land and build homes for the people?" I said, "My dear woman, everybody in Memphis might own his home and yet Memphis go to the devil anyhow."

Home ownership, good roads, better houses, higher wages—all are good in their places; but America needs something deeper. She needs emphasis on the soul life. Less emphasis on the material, more on the spiritual. Well indeed does Mr. Babson say: "We have gone daffy over things like steam, electricity, water power, buildings, railroads and ships, and we have forgotten the human soul upon which all of these things depend, and from which all of these things originate." Yes, indeed, we have gone daffy over "things." We place more emphasis on "things" than on the soul. We have forgotten the words of Jesus: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you."

Two men were visiting Niagara. One complained of the vast amount of undeveloped power as being the greatest in the country. "No," replied his friend; "the greatest undeveloped power in America is the and saw a dirty, freckled-faced boy playing in the gutter. She invited him to Sunday school. "I ain't a-going," said he. She showed him a shining sixpence and said: "If you come next Sunday I will give you that." "I'll be there," replied the boy, and he was there, cleaner than he had been in a long time. He had washed his face. He had even washed himself behind the ears, and when a boy washes himself behind his ears voluntarily, you know there is something happening in that boy. That boy was Amos Sutton, who became one of the world's greatest missionaries, and he did not look very promising to begin with.

A number of years ago a man came into our church. He was poverty-stricken, discouraged and blue. We gave him something to eat. He said: "I am willing to do anything I can." He helped our janitor around the kitchen for his meals. That janitor led him to Jesus. The first Christmas morning after he had been baptized, he said to me: "Doctor Cox, this is the first Christmas morning in twenty years that I have not had to face the judge." He went to Houston, and worked for awhile in the Rescue Mission. Then he did some fine work in the First Baptist Church. Often when Dr. Leavell, the pastor, would be writing me he would say: "'Shorty' sends kind regards. He is doing good work here." Recently he came to spend a short time in Memphis. He was well dressed, had saved money, and was very happy in the Lord. This man, who was very unpromising in appearance to begin with, made a good talk at our Noon Meeting.

A man came to me one morning with his feet sticking out of his shoes. Every time he stepped you could hear the water. We found him food and friends. After being away from Memphis two years he wrote: "Dear Sir: Do you remember the wreck of humanity who came to see you two years ago with his feet sticking out of his shoes? Well, I am that man. I just want to tell you that I was elected cashier of this bank last Saturday. Pray for me."

Three months later he wrote: "I enclose my first quarterly report. The bank is doing well. Pray for me." Still later he wrote: "The president is sick and they have asked me to take his place until he gets well. Pray for me and remember me to the noon meeting." The last letter I got says: "I have now moved to—, where the bank has several million dollars in deposits. Remember me to the meeting and pray for me. The first chance I get, I want to take a vacation and come to Memphis to see you." All of these men were very unpromising from the standpoint of appearance. We helped them by helping them to help themselves.

PUTTING emphasis upon the soul life pays tremendously. It even pays financially. You have but to be a student of history to notice that every great era of prosperity in America has followed a revival era. Real prosperity does not come from raw material. Real prosperity does not come from education.

Mr. Babson reminds us that real prosperity is founded on faith, integrity, industry, co-operation, soul. He was employed to gather statistics concerning seventy of the greatest manufacturers, merchants and railroad builders. The leading men who have made America by developing the fields, the forests, the mines and the industries. He tells us that he found only five per cent. of this seventy were sons of bankers, ten per cent. sons of manufacturers, fifteen per cent. of the seventy were sons of merchants, while over thirty per cent. of them were the sons of poor preachers and poor farmers. He correctly reminds us that security does not depend on steel vaults and time clocks. Human security, soul security, religion in the heart and the life—that is what you need in order to feel safe. The integrity of the bankers and the workers is of more importance than the steel vault and the fine building. America's security, America's success is founded not in locks and bolts but in souls.

America is in danger of making the same mistake that the rich fool did in the parable. The rich fool made the mistake first of leaving out God. If America is wrong towards God, she cannot be right anywhere. "In the beginning God—" is the only safe way to start.

Surely the rich fool was not more foolish than the American who tries to feed his soul on corn, cotton, coal, oil-wells, railroads, houses, lots and jewelry. The trouble is he tried to feed his soul on things, and souls cannot be fed on things. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you."

What shall it profit America if she shall gain the whole world, and lose her own soul? What shall America give in exchange for her soul?

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Praise God, from Whom All Blessings Flow," or "My Faith Looks up to Thee."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Mark 4: 3-20—"Parable of the Sower."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (see page 307, first column).

Sermon—"THE SOUL-LIFE OF A NATION"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing," or "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Saviour."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

To Thee, all wise and loving Father, we commend our spirits after this hour's worship, and as we depart fill our hearts with joy at the thought of thy salvation through Jesus Christ, our Lord. AMEN.

soul of man." Mr. Babson tells of a visit to a farmer who took great pride in his fine stock. The pedigree was hanging over the cows and the other animals. Blue prints were kept in his office referring to each one. The visitor asked: "What about your laborers?" "Oh," said the farmer, "they all look alike to me." There are many Americans, I fear, who are like the men on the coast of Gadara. When Jesus caused the devil to come out of the wild man and go into the swine, and they ran down a steep place and were drowned, their owners besought Jesus to leave their midst. Why? Because they cared more for pigs than for people; and just to the extent that America cares more for pigs than she does for people, she will do all she can to keep Jesus out of her midst. Why do men want the liquor traffic? Why do they want to legalize vicious shows? Simply for the reason that they are more for pigs than for people. What is the greatest trouble with Capital and Labor? It lies in the fact that Capital has forgotten that Labor has a soul, and Labor has forgotten that Capital has a soul. We hear people sometimes talking about "soulless corporations." I want to say to you that I believe that in some of these so-called "soulless corporations," are men with mighty big souls. I repeat: The great need is for the employer and the employee both to realize the importance of the soul element.

THIS is true everywhere and very true in our church life. We can not be reminded too often that the great need of all the churches is emphasis upon the soul, upon the spiritual. We need often to be reminded of the truth of the old text: "Man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." A Sunday-school teacher was out one day

Perpetual Springtime

SUNDAY. Psa. 1:13. "His leaf also shall not wither." The leaf is the thing of the Spring-time. It is the first thing that comes. How soon it loses its delightful freshness! How soon the sweet greenness passes into the darker shades of Summer, and becomes sere and yellow in the older days of Autumn!

But my text speaks of a religious life whose leaf shall retain its freshness through all the changing days. The Spring glory shall not wither as the years roll away. The beauties of the Spring-time shall continue through all the seventy years. The characteristic charms of childhood shall never be destroyed. Life shall grow. It shall increase in knowledge. It shall broaden in experience. It shall open out large capacities and powers. But amid all the many and varied developments, the beauties of childhood shall remain. "His leaf shall not wither."

What are the leaves which make childhood so beautiful? They are these: hope and sympathy. These are the fresh green adornments of the Spring-time of life. How many of us lose them as life passes forward into its prime! There is so much that is hostile to them in the very atmosphere of the world we have to breathe. There is the repeated experience of failure. There is the terrible chill of sorrow and care. There is the growing sense of personal sin. There is the increasing knowledge of the world's depravity. There is the ever-present might of the tempter. There is the cold mystery of death.

All these pervade and possess us, and in their bitter blasts our Spring leaves begin to wither. The "tender leaves of hope" begin to lose their freshness; the delicate leaves of sympathy begin to fade away.

As men and women leave their youth and childhood behind, they are apt to decline in one of two ways—to become pessimists or formalists. A pessimist is a soul from whose branches the green leaf of hope has withered away. A formalist is a soul from whose branches the green leaf of sympathy has withered away. When these leaves fade and droop, the world becomes unspeakably poor.

That is a wonderful word in the Apocalypse wherein we are told that "the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." It is full of beautiful suggestiveness. "The leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations." If ever the wounds and sorrows of the world are to be healed, it will have to be by the leaves of the Tree of Life, the green leaves of the Spring-time, the leaves of hope and sympathy. It is the child-like disposition which is to heal the world's broken heart.

The Right Source of Knowledge

MONDAY. John 5:39. "Search the Scriptures." The quest of truth was set forth by the ancient Greeks in the story of Jason and the Argonauts who set forth in the good ship "Argo" to find the golden fleece. It would have been a vain quest, despite the fact that Hercules, and Orpheus with his lyre, and the twins Castor and Pollux were of that famous crew, had they not known with some degree of certainty where the golden fleece was to be found. Somewhere among the islands of the Hesperides? That was too vague. But Colchis would answer, just there and nowhere else. So, thither they sailed, found the fleece and brought it back with them.

Truth is the principal thing; but where shall we search for it? There must be some place of authority, whither we can go with assurance. To wander about among the islands of the Hesperides, guided by nothing more trustworthy than opinion and guess-work, doubting and wondering, with the rocks and forests as four farthest horizons, this is to pursue a hopeless quest.

In such a case it is little wonder if we are lost in doubt and perplexity. To our cry, "Where is truth?" there is no answer but a mocking echo, "What is truth?" But when the Christian opens his Bible, lo, from every page there comes a voice, "I am the Truth."

If, then, a man would be a believer and not a perpetual doubter, if he would rest on authority and not on mere speculation, let him search the Scriptures; for "This is the judge that ends the strife

When wit and reason fail,
Our guide to everlasting life
Through all the gloomy vale."

The Sophistries of Satan

TUESDAY. Luke 12:20. "But God said unto him, Thou fool; this night thy soul shall be required of thee." A dying millionaire was asked by his pastor what he would like to have sung at his bedside. The reply was, "Sing 'Come ye sinners, poor and needy.'" He felt the need of divine help than his two hundred millions. Is it not well to profit by the experience and testimony of others? Another departing rich man remarked, "It is not what I have given away that troubles me, but the millions I am leaving." Why, then, should the heirs struggle to obtain that which seems a weight upon the soul of the one going to meet the Judge of the universe?

A Parisian chemist poisoned by his new discovery, left a note in his laboratory, saying, "Such a substance is poison and the proof of it is that I am dying." He wrote with his trembling hand so that others might be warned. How many still pour down the poisoned liquor after the funeral of the drunkard, after the nation has prohibited, and millions are in desolated homes and drunkards' graves! What fools men are to throw away the pearl of life immortal!

Those who have little faith in God often have great credulity about their own ability to resist temptation, to know when to stop. We hear them say, "I can use these bonds of the bank to secure my broker, as I speculate; I am no thief; I am treasurer of a great institution. I expect to restore these securities and never be detected." Have not such resolutions paved the way to destruction for many a heart and home? Why will men walk on the edge of a precipice when others have fallen around them? Are not wild animals often wiser than men? An animal avoids the trap that smells of blood, but human beings walk into the same old trap where the bones of other victims lie around. The thirty pieces of silver tempt them; like Judas, they think more of money than of their Master.

Man, a little lower than the angels, created in the image of God, becomes a demon from choice, loving the sophistries of Satan rather than the salvation of Christ. O child of heaven, how art thou fallen! Arise and Christ shall give thee life, light and riches unsearchable!

Liberty and License

WEDNESDAY. John 8:36. "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." Thomas Carlyle once said, "Liberty needs new definitions." If this was true in his day, it is more true in ours. Liberty and license are too frequently confused. Liberty is conduct according to law. License is conduct unregulated by law. When a ship's steering-gear is impaired, a signal is raised, "Not under control." There are multitudes of lives which should raise such a signal. A slave may be freer than his master, a prisoner freer than his keeper. The apostle James speaks of the "royal law of liberty." What is it? It is to find the laws of our being and live in obedience to them. As J. G. Holland once wrote, "A fish is free when it is in its element—the water; a bird is free when it is in its element—the air; a man is free when he is in his element—the law."

We are wise to inquire, What is the right environment for our natures? Each of us is endowed with two natures, a physical and a spiritual. The simplest statement of spiritual law is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thy neighbor as thyself."

What is the relation of Christ to this freedom? He makes us conscious of spiritual law. He inspires us with a desire to be subject to it. He assists our wills by fellowship with Himself and by mystic grace from heaven, strengthening our purposes to choose the right and to reject the wrong. This is none other than the Christian plan of salvation. It is very effective and very simple, as most effective things are. "He is a free man whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves beside."

Strength and Power

THURSDAY. Deut. 33:25. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." The future in fact and character is wholly involved in the present. The duties, needs interests and thoughts of the present, as they are met and attended to, determine the future. "Now is the essential time." "The inward man is renewed day by day." "Give us this day our daily bread." "Take no anxious thought for the morrow." These and many more passages like them indicate our true attitude toward life. Our desire is prone to run ahead of this and live in the future.

HINTS

By Arthur Wallace Peach

WHAT end may be in God's mysterious plan
That shapes the hidden destiny of man
No one may know; but every noble deed
Hints what the goal may be He has decreed!

This is just as unreasonable as living beyond one's means. Strength comes in the day and in the use of the day. A man is not a man born; we are all born as babes. We grow day by day. We walk step by step. We learn experience after experience. Our maturity dawns when we learn how to sing "One step enough for me." This is the law and procession of life. Strength is given, not for the day, but in the day. God makes us strong as the day is employed to that end. Strength is not something given to us to lay in store against the time of need. Strength develops in the struggle. Power to do lies in the doing. It grows as we grow. It is life itself, a present and never a future. Act today, fight today, be true today and you will be strong today. You will be strong tomorrow in proportion as you have been strong today.

At best, we are on the way. Therefore we can have but relative strength, relative knowledge, relative truth. We can never have full knowledge, full power, but day by day. We are not only in transit, but also in progress. Increased strength is the gift of each day as it comes. Back of every strong tomorrow lies a strong today, and back of every strong today a strong yesterday. Strength is not stored, but current power.

That Lost Blessing

FRIDAY. II Kings 6:6—"And the man of God said, Where fell it? And he showed him the place." The old, historic Jordan has been the scene of many miracles. Like all other miracles, the story of the loss and recovery of the borrowed axe-head is also a parable. Of what use is a foolish ax-handle, held even in the hands of a prophet of God, when the axe itself is sinking deeper and deeper into the mud of the river? About as much use as a lamp without oil or a Christian without grace.

And that is how it often happens: many times our peace and power go swinging off into the air, while we are engrossed in enlarging our material habitations.

And then there comes the reaction; when we are painfully conscious of our loss. We miss the old liberty and unction, the old trust and conscious joy and power for service have ceased to be. The old spiritual equipment has been stripped from us, and nobody takes us seriously—our words have no effect. How can we get a new grip upon the powers we used to possess?

Every day, we see men and women losing the power of God, but not so frequently do we see them seeking its return. Yet to the sincere seeker of any kind of lost energy there is but one fruitful path: "Go back and recover it right where you lost it." That was Elisha's advice to the young prophet, and it is the only wise course to follow. You will find your pocket knife and your glasses and your health and your reputation and your power right where you lost them. How do you trace lost things? You make your memory go back with scurrying feet through the steps of your mind. What was I doing then? You can't go back and tear up the path of time, but you can go back and retrace the path of experience. We will find that we were sleeping, like Bunyon's Christian when he lost his precious roll. And we must find it, as he did, by going back. We lost our love for prayer when we grew too busy and careless to pray. We lost our power of confession when the Devil closed our mouth. We lost our purity of heart when we entertained evil thoughts. Retrace; go back; do it now!

Misunderstanding Jesus

SATURDAY. Matt. 15:16. "Are ye also yet without understanding?" The Master marvelled more than once at dullness of mind on the part of his hearers. It is true, he made use of picturesque imagery, which required thought for its complete elucidation. But his pictures do not obscure, they only explain the truth.

The language of Jesus does not demand expert literary interpretation. It is a wonder that people do not understand Him better. Why are they troubled to understand His meaning, even to this day? Perhaps because "no man ever so spoke" before. The strikingly new is always more or less inexplicable. It is only the common-place that is wholly intelligible.

The ideas of Jesus are so utterly unlike those with which the world is most familiar that He seems to speak a strange tongue. Even yet it is so! Religious truth is conventionally supposed to be mysterious and incomprehensible; the plain and simple statement of truth by Jesus must carry some dark mystery, which the man of the street cannot be expected to understand. We stumble over His simplicity and, by obscurantist methods, keep the world in darkness. His own words are still and always will be the best revelation of his original mind.

The World News of the Week.

New American Note Demands Equal Rights in Fixing Mandates

PRESIDENT HARDING and his advisers are taking their time in the formulation of international policies and it is evident that the new administration is to be committed to no definite line of action until its probable consequences have been considered carefully and the co-operation of these men necessary for its carrying out has been obtained. In accordance with this open-minded attitude, a plan which one day seems to be in the highest favor may be at the bottom of the heap next day, while the possibilities of another program are being weighed.

For a time it was generally believed that Senator Knox's resolution for a separate peace with Germany would be put through Congress with President Harding's support, but this scheme fell into disfavor, and there was an agreement that any peace plan should be submitted, in its original form at least, by the President. With this latter view was coupled the proposal that the Versailles Treaty should be ratified with the League of Nations covenant removed in so far as it is possible to unwind the covenant from the other provisions. There also was the suggestion that President Harding should send to Europe next month a commission of distinguished men, probably headed by Elihu Root, to confer with European governments regarding the organization of a new international association to take the place of the League and to be based upon the permanent court of international justice to be established at The Hague.

One definite move for the maintenance of American rights, which appears as the dominant motive of the administration, was the despatch to the principal Allied Powers of a note definitely reaffirming Mr. Wilson's refusal to recognize the allocation of the island of Yap to Japan or the validity of Japan's mandate over former German islands in the Pacific. The note was not limited, however, to the Japanese mandate, but denied that the Allied Powers or any other agency, has any right to make a "valid or effective disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany, now under consideration, without the assent of the United States." Secretary Hughes's presentation of the American attitude was perfect in logic, arguing that the right to dispose of Germany's colonies was acquired only through the victory of the Allied and Associated Powers and that the United States never had vested either the Allied Supreme Council or the League with any authority to bind the United States or act on its behalf. The note quoted a letter by Mr. Wilson flatly denying the contention that he had ever consented to the assignment of Yap to Japan and stating that all agreements regarding the assignment of mandates were conditional.

The American note caused much concern, upsetting as it does so much work of the Supreme Council and the League. French diplomats in particular were worried, pending a fuller determination of the American policy, but with former Premier René Viviani in the United States to acquaint American officials with the French Government's views there was a feeling that matters would adjust themselves satisfactorily.

New York to Enforce Prohibition

MUNICIPAL authorities in the state of New York have ceased to be neutrals in the conflicts between federal prohibition officers and rum-runners as the result of new legislation which brings the state statutes into line with the national laws, and have begun campaigns against the illicit liquor dealers. Only time can tell how determined and effective these campaigns will be, but at least there no longer is any legal sanction for ignoring the activities of the rum-runners.

One of the three state prohibition measures just made effective by the signature of Governor Miller, repealed the law which permitted traffic in light wines and 3½ per cent. beer, and banned all beverages containing more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol, the federal standard; another charged local authorities with the enforcement of prohibition; and the third amended the civil rights law by providing for the recovery of damages suffered by reason of selling or giving away intoxicants.

In New York City orders were issued to the 11,000 members of the police force to exert themselves to make the city dry. The Police Commissioner presented a request for an additional 1,000 men and for $100,000 to aid in getting evidence. The first day of police activity resulted in a score of arrests—not a very formidable showing, but the liquor dispensers were exercising greater caution on sales while waiting to see how strong an effort the police were to make. An interesting sidelight on the status of prohibition enforcement was the abrogation of the old order forbidding policemen in uniform to enter a saloon. Many, many saloons have been operating in New York with all the old-time paraphernalia and with no attempt to disguise the nature of their business.

Railroad Unions Offer Plan

LEADERS of the 500,000 shop employees of American railroads have submitted to President Harding their plans for settling the wage controversy between the companies and the workers and outlining the terms to which they would consent. Their telegram suggested the calling of a conference to work out new rules for working conditions to take the place of the national agreements. They declared that the national agreements must not be abrogated except at the conference table and that the men must have a signed agreement with railroad managements guaranteeing just and reasonable conditions of employment; but they expressed a willingness to drop any rules which may be unjust and a desire to promote the productive efficiency of labor and capital. Included in the message was declaration of twelve "self-evident and inalienable industrial rights," the first being that of collective bargaining.

The Railway Labor Board, before which the wage controversy has centered, refused to grant the plea of the New York Central Railroad for a provisional reduction in the wages of its unskilled employees and announced that a consolidated hearing of all petitions for wage reductions would start on April 18. Twenty-six lines had filed requests for lower wage scales.

Leaders of the Big Four railroad brotherhoods held a conference in New York with representatives of securities holders and declared they would resist efforts to overcome deficits solely by cutting wages, suggesting methods of economizing in other ways. President Harding continued conferences on the railroad situation and several of the union leaders were among his callers.

Greeks Defeated in Asia Minor

THE Greek offensive against the Turkish Nationalists in Asia Minor has been halted by a defeat which has forced a retreat along a considerable section of the front and brought the northern wing of the Greek army to the verge of disaster. The Greeks, in launching their drive contrary to the advice of Allied military experts, hoped to destroy the army of Mustapha Kemal, but that general succeeded in withdrawing his forces until he was ready for a counter blow. He struck the advancing Greeks at Eski-Shehr, on the road to Angora and drove them back, estimates of the Greek losses ranging as high as 5,000 killed.

Athens admitted that the Greeks had been forced to break off their offensive against Eski-Shehr and to retire to their original positions, but declared that the morale of the troops was superb and that the drive would be renewed in a few days. Reinforcements were hurried to the northern front and it was believed that wing of the army would be extricated. A serious defeat for the Greeks would change the entire Turkish situation and make it necessary to call another Allied conference regarding the Turkish Treaty, so that other countries were watching the developments with anxiety.

M. Gounaris, Minister of War, and other Greek leaders who had been in Paris asserted on their return to Athens that all misunderstandings between Greece and the Allies had been cleared up, these difficulties dating back to Constantine's return to the throne. Finances were the chief worry of the Greeks when they launched their offensive, but it was asserted Greece had funds to carry on the war against Mustapha Kemal for three months without outside aid.

Charles Back in Switzerland

FORMER Emperor Charles, his dreams of an immediate return to the throne of the Hapsburgs shattered, has returned ingloriously to Switzerland, and all of Southern Europe is breathing more easily again. But even his disillusionizing experiences in the countries over which he once ruled failed to shake the royal pretensions of Charles and before starting once more into exile he signed this declaration: "His Majesty leaves the country because of his conviction that the moment has not yet come for him to take over his right of governing. He cannot permit maintenance of his right to entail disturbances of the present state of peace. He leaves the land as the crowned king of Hungary."

It was not as a king but as a somewhat troublesome refugee that he was received back into Switzerland. His adventure had caused indignant discussion in the Swiss Parliament, and the Canton de Vaud, in which he had been living for two years, refused to welcome him again. Accordingly he was met at the frontier by a military police officer and several detectives, and typewritten documents setting forth conditions for his conduct were handed to him. He was conveyed to Luzerne, where he occupied the suite in which King Constantine lived while an exile, a fact which he regarded as a happy omen.

Crowds at many stations along the former Emperor's route gave expressions of loyalty, but at Bruck in Lower Austria, there was a hostile demonstration by workmen which held up his train for five hours. A considerable number of officers who had renewed their oaths of allegiance accompanied Charles into exile, among them General Lehar, who resigned command of the West Hungarian troops.

British Miners Still Out

AFTER a week of idleness for the 1,200,000 British coal miners and a week of conferences by union leaders, mine owners and government officials, the conflict so damaging to all British industry remained unsettled. Considering the magnitude of the strike, there was little disorder, although in several instances there were minor riots due to attempts by the strikers to prevent the working of the pumps which keep the mines from being flooded. In Wales there were attempts to hoist the red flag over mining property, but cooler heads among the men frustrated such efforts.

British officials from Premier Lloyd George down were attempting to bring the union leaders and the mine owners together for negotiations, but the first efforts failed because of the refusal of the miners to allow the pumpmen to return as a preliminary to the discussions. Later the unions permitted the return of the pump men and negotiations were resumed with the prospects for an agreement much brighter.

While the peace efforts were being made, the other members of the Triple Alliance of Labor—the National Union of Railwaymen and the Transport Workers Union—were delaying definite action, but were making preparations for a strike. The Triple Alliance numbers so many millions of members and its power is so great, dominating vital industries, that a strike by

A Copy-Book Couplet

WE USED to write it in our copy-books in the far-off days of primary school—a couplet with long swinging lines and a pleasant meter.

It May Come Back, with a New Meaning, from School Days

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

We used to write it carefully, with chubby fingers gripped moistly about a fat pen—paying particular attention to the slim, light upstrokes and the heavy, ultra-impressive downstrokes. And when we had copied it some twenty-five times, with never a blot to mar the whiteness of the page, we laid the books aside with the feeling that we had done something worth while—something to justify our small existences. But I doubt if we ever really sensed the meaning of the lines that we wrote in such a painstaking manner.

And yet, this morning as I waked from sleep, the couplet came back to me—remembered imperfectly, perhaps, as to wording, but with the ruling thought of it quite unimpaired.

"And now there dawneth another bright day" is the way that it came back.

"Think—wilt thou let it slip useless away?"

THE days follow each other so rapidly, so steadily, so changelessly—one after the other in an endless procession—that we have come to take them as a matter of course, I reckon. At least I have. It is hard to keep back the reflection that there are three hundred and sixty-five days to the year—that there are many thousands of days to the average lifetime. And that if a certain task cannot be accomplished, cannot even be started today, it can certainly be fitted into one of those thousands of days that are to come! The number of them, all looming empty in the future, is one of the mainest reasons why a great many days—overcrowded and at hand—are allowed to "slip useless away."

I like to sit and dream at my desk; who doesn't? I like to watch the people in the windows across from my office, I like to peer down at the throngs that hurry along our crowded city streets. And often I like to imagine, idly, what I'd do if I could get out into the country for a week or so—often times I like to wonder whether the violets and arbutus are beginning to show their shy faces in a certain stretch of woodland that is not too many miles away.

I like to sit and dream at my desk. And many times, as I sit there, my mail basket is crowded with letters, and my manuscript basket is filled to overflowing, and there is a large new yellow pad just waiting to be covered with writing. And in the very back of my mind my conscience is saying to me, "If you don't finish your work there'll be twice as much—twice as much—to do tomorrow!" And I'm quite apt to say, to my conscience:

"But I may feel so much like working, tomorrow, that I'll be able to do twice as much!" The curious fact is that I seldom do feel so much like working!

I SEEM to be reverting today, in my thoughts, to the primary school, and copy-books. For I am remembering distinctly, as I write, a story that we used to read aloud in class. I remember how we used to stumble over the two-syllable words, how we used to sing-song the sentences as we read!

The story was not strikingly original as to theme. But, at the time, it impressed us as being very clever. And even now I find more than a grain of truth in it. This is the story:

There was once a farmer who had lived all of his life in a peaceful way. He had never known any bad luck, his crops were usually good, his friends were true, and his wife and children were kind and affectionate. Indeed, it would seem that he had little to wish for. And yet, despite all of his good fortune, he had one great unfulfilled desire.

Almost all of the other farmers, for miles about, had—at one time or another—been forced to resort to the law. At one time or another they had hitched up the old team and driven into town to consult a lawyer. But the farmer in question had never been forced to do so. For his work had always gone smoothly, and his path had always been a sunshiny one. And so, when the other men gathered together and discussed their legal experiences, he was forced to keep silent. And it worried him. For to keep silent seemed to be a confession that he was inexperienced—that he was lacking in initiative and progress.

"If only," he told his wife one day, "I had at some time had to consult a lawyer!"

It rankled in the man's mind—that unfulfilled desire. And the upshot of the matter was that one day he hitched up his team of horses and drove to town. And the house that he left his team in front of was the lawyer's house!

IT IS unusual for a man with no trouble to consult a lawyer. And the lawyer said so, frankly.

"What on earth are you coming to me for?" he questioned as the farmer entered his office, "there's nothing I can do for you."

The farmer was eager to explain. "Just give me some advice," he said simply, "some good advice." So that I'll be able to say that I've consulted you!"

The lawyer was laughing. "Oh," he said, "I see!" And then he sat down and scribbled a line on a bit of paper and folded the paper into an envelope.

"Here's your advice," he said. "Read it carefully when you get home." And the farmer took the envelope and put it in his pocket and paid his fee and drove home, very happily, to his wife and family.

The story went on to tell, mostly in easy words, what happened. It told how the farmer read the advice and found that it was only an old proverb—"Never leave until tomorrow what you can do today!" And then it told how he went out into the fields and took in the hay crop that he had planned to leave until the next morning. And how—crowning coincidence!—it had rained the next morning.

THE lawyer, in writing down the old proverb, was playing safe. For the proverb was one that is usually right. It's hardly ever wrong to do at once the work that must be done.

And this, I think, brings me back to my starting place. For if I—and if everybody else—did the work that must be done, leaving as little as possible until the next day, and the next, and the rest of the three hundred and sixty-five, few of the bright days would "slip useless away!"

I'm not putting up a high gate barring out, entirely, the dreams and the fancies that will come! I've caught more than a flash of inspiration while I was sitting idly at my desk—looking, perhaps, out of the window. But I'm suggesting that we sandwich in the necessary things—the work and the responsibilities—between our dreams!

It's often hard to do the work,
That comes week in, week out;
It's hard to never whine and shirk,
Or sigh and turn about!
It's hard to wash and mend and sweep,
And have no time for play—
It's hard to do the things we must,
And get them done today!

I often wish that all the earth,
Were made of joy and fun;
That only happiness and mirth,
Were ours from sun to sun.
I envy all the birds that fly,
On vivid, widespread wing—
But birds build homes, like you and I,
They do not only sing!

Welch's 1 Grapelade the pure grape spread

ORDER a jar of Welch's Grapelade from your grocer today. Then ask the genius of your kitchen to make a plate of piping hot, seven o'clock muffins.

In the tart-sweet taste of Grapelade you can picture the ripe clusters of fruit as they hang heavy on the vines in the mellow October sunshine. Grapelade is just whole ripe grapes, juice and all. It is not a by-product. Seeds and skins are removed and acid crystals taken out by our patented process. Only pure sugar is added. This leaves Grapelade velvety smooth with a rich delicate flavor.

Use Grapelade as a spread for bread, toast, muffins and griddle cakes. It is splendid as a sauce for meats. And it makes a delightful filling for jelly roll and other pastry. For ice cream and puddings, Grapelade is a new idea.

Your grocer has Grapelade in 15 oz. glass jars and 7 oz. tumblers. Write for a recipe folder.

The Welch Lades—pure fruit spreads—include

Grapelade, Fruilade (Grape-Raspberry), Peachlade, Cherrilade, Apple Butter, Plumlade, Strawberrylade, Blackberilade, Currantlade. All in 15 oz. glass jars.

If your grocer cannot supply you, a box of 9 jars of assorted Lades, as above, will be sent securely packed and prepaid on receipt of $4.50. (West of Denver $5.50.)

International Sunday-School Lesson for May 1
Deut. 6:4-9; Prov. 3:13-18; Luke 2:52

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

JESUS was the kind of a boy every boy should be, and the best description of Him as a real boy is given in Luke 2:52: "And Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." Here you have the elements which are basic in the four-fold life, and they will find expression in the life of every worth-while boy today. At such summer camps as Conference Point, Lake Geneva, Wis., conducted by the International Sunday School Association, these component parts of the four-fold life are constantly taught and exemplified. Any boy or girl who can "camp" there for even one season will receive abiding influences for good.

Being the Son of God did not prevent Jesus from developing a perfectly normal life just like any other lad. He kept Himself from sin. As a Jewish child He received His education as did other Jewish boys. He was taught at home and in the schools of that day. He attended the synagogue at Nazareth. His chief text book was the Old Testament, or at least those portions to which He had access. How well He mastered His lessons and how extensively He read and understood them is manifested when He went up to the Temple at Jerusalem at the age of twelve. He could hold His own in conversation and interpretation with the doctors of the law.

Certain portions of the Law were written on parchment and placed in the phylacteries. These were worn, on occasions, on the forehead and the left arm. The lesson text from Deuteronomy was one of these selections. This same portion also was written on parchment and placed in the Mezuzah, and thus became a working text for each member of the household. The Mezuzah was a little case affixed to the door post. The scroll placed within it was so folded that the Hebrew word for God, Shadai, written on the reverse side, appeared at a small slot or window in the Mezuzah. Each time the Hebrew passed within or without the home he pressed his finger to this word Shadai and then kissed the finger. Now read Deut. 6:4-9 and observe the divine command with reference to religious education in every Jewish home. In Proverbs the scope of education is broadened and man is urged to seek "wisdom."

THE history of education is the history of the church. When a parent makes it possible for a child to obtain a practical education a wealth of ability is made available which is worth more than dollars. Self-denying parents appreciate this fact when they see to it that their children have scholastic advantages which may have been denied to them. This generation offers an opportunity for almost everyone to gain a liberal and advanced education. Handicaps prove advantages rather than otherwise. The person who must overcome obstacles to obtain his schooling studies with a different purpose than the fellow who would rather train a bull pup than his own mind.

To know God and Jesus Christ His Son as a personal Saviour is the acme of education. To study things and not know God's relation thereto is faulty and surely not scientific and in these days educators insist that we must be scientific in our methods.

As in the days of Jesus so today, a man is ignorant indeed who does not know the Bible. General literature cannot be understood without knowing this Book of books. The Sunday school by many is well called the Bible school. Would that the actual Bible had a larger place in every Sunday school! Many never think of carrying their Bible to Sunday School, but that is not to be wondered at when they know no better than to look for the Ten Commandments in the New Testament and the Lord's Prayer in the Old Testament. It is granted that the brief study hour on Sunday is not enough. Only twenty-six hours for instruction in a year puts an awful obligation of responsibility on the teacher. Week-day religious instruction and Daily Vacation Bible Schools are helping greatly in this work of Christian education. In a growing number of communities high school credits are given for satisfactory Bible study which is independent of public school instruction. In becoming acquainted with the content of the Bible the reader is using the best seller in the world. Every second of the year a copy of the Holy Bible comes from one of the many presses of the world. On some of the foreign mission fields whole editions are sold in advance of printing. Day and night work cannot supply the demand for the Bible.

Young Timothy had religious instruction in the home from both his mother and grandmother. This should still be the custom except that the father should take his essential place as another important faculty instructor. The family altar is invaluable though it does not take the place of the individual "Morning Watch." The story-telling hour in the home is never more popular with the children than when some of the great Bible stories are being related. The church is also a wonderful school, though some ministers preach as if there were no eager, listening, children in the audience.

ONE of the great needs today is for more students for the Christian ministry. The money-making days and the days of the necessity to make money on account of the H. C. L. have turned from the ministry as a life work many who might otherwise have enlisted in this the highest service. Christian service is a supreme vocation and the larger expression of it can be obtained when one gives his or her entire time as a minister or missionary. An adequate education can be obtained so that one is well equipped for Christian leadership. Over in Korea, for example, work is being abandoned simply because there are not enough ministers, teachers and doctors to man the stations. The call is also strong for educated Christian men and women in the home field. Ask your pastor for advice and information. If necessary you can be assisted financially in your college and advanced courses by your denominational Board of Education. There is a way for every willing worker.

While "education" makes one think of college and professional schools there is another school which cannot be lost sight of and it enrolls the largest number of students. It may be called the School of Personal Experience. Some call it the School of Hard Knocks. Books are wonderful teachers and these can be supplemented by correspondence courses, etc. A full college course means only about 7,000 hours of recitation and study, and it covers four years. Two hours of special study daily for ten years will be more than an equivalent in hours of opportunity to acquire broad and useful information. The use we make of what we know is more important than the mere fact of knowledge. Many college graduates, do not help this needy world as much as do self-made men. When asked to indicate her academic degrees upon enrolling at the Tokio Sunday School Convention a certain well-known lesson writer, who had never been to college, stated that her degree was A. D., which meant Adjuster of Difficulties. She declared that this work seemed to be her special mission in life.

The teacher-training courses, including the advanced years, offered by the denominations and International Sunday School Association, furnish the subject matter for a number of years of special study. The subjects are broad, comprehensive and practical. Above all study and learn from the Master Teacher, even Jesus Christ.

Can We Advertise Christianity?

straight-forward message that men can understand, humanity will be reaping other whirlwinds of its own misguided sowing, worse perhaps than the recent abysmal catastrophe with its contemporary horrors and ensuing train of evils, one after another of which yet rises to plague us whenever we think the last has been allayed.

Modern channels of publicity have placed before the Church the greatest and most receptive audience in human history. The science of advertising offers a tried and proven method of reaching this audience and guarantees the result of a well-conceived effort permanently sustained.

The greatest opportunity of the ages lies at hand for organized Christianity to grasp.

If the vision and the purpose are not wanting, the spiritual darkness of the present tempestuous times may be only the prophetic gloom before the dawn of a golden age.

Opinions on Mr. Lewis's Program

THE replies of the group of men and women requested to express an opinion regarding the desirability and feasibility of Mr. Lewis's suggestion varied widely. We are unable to print all of the excellent replies which were received, but reproduce below extracts from the letters which show the different shades of opinion.

Dr. Christian F. Reisner terms it "sane, fair and altogether timely," adding: "The world never needed religion as at this moment and never was more hungry for it. A campaign of broad publicity along the general lines of enforcing the claims of religion would help all the churches and do more good to the nation than any other one thing now proposed."

Rev. William A. Sunday comments that the idea "has been tried with varying degrees of success, and that is about the best thing you can say about it. It would be difficult to have a continued effort along that line, and the other side of it would be, 'Who would finance it?' I can see more difficulties than I can encouragement."

Raymond B. Fosdick says of the article: "I find myself disagreeing with its conclusions. I doubt very much whether any advertising campaign such as Mr. Lewis suggests would have anything more than a superficial effect. After the fiasco of the Interchurch, I am afraid of big campaigns and big splurges of money and modern business methods as related to the teachings of Christ. The two seem fundamentally incompatible."

W. R. MOODY, president of the Northfield Schools, writes: "The question of advertising does not seem to me to cover the need, for the Interchurch World Movement spent money lavishly in just this sort of campaign, and I question very much how effective it proved. An advertising campaign is not, in my judgment, the solution of the problem, but rather an awakened sense of responsibility on the part of individual Christians for their associates, a careful study of the needs of men, and an adaptation of the forms of worship to meet such needs."

Fred B. Smith, of New York, says the article is "simply splendid" and "I believe in it heartily," but adds the opinion that "if anybody started it as a propaganda with the old scheme of a big committee and a chairman and then some experts upon various phases, etc., it would be furiously resented."

Dr. Francis E. Clark founder of Christian Endeavor, says: "The plan that Mr. Lewis urges is one of great interest and promise if it could be carried out. I fear, however, that this is not an auspicious time for such a program. To pay at regular newspaper rates for any advertising that would impress the country would, of course, mean a very large sum, and it is perhaps a question whether such advertisements would be very widely read."

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Christian Temple, Baltimore, writes: "If it is done in a strong, bold, frank, spiritual fashion, I can see no objection to it at all, for the Gospel of these times certainly needs an interpretation different from that which is in the minds of many."

Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin, pastor of the West End Presbyterian Church, New York, calls the article "excellent, a succinct statement of a serious handicap."

James M. Speers, of New York, finds himself "in accord almost completely with all that the writer states." "It would be almost impossible, I think, to get the Protestant Church unitedly to undertake such a thing at the present time," he adds, "but the carrying forward of such a plan would be no more an alliance between the Church and the world than the publication of the Gospel message in many another way, through the weekly religious papers, for example, through the missionary magazines, etc."

DR. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, New York, writes: "I think the scheme is impracticable. The churches would not unite for any such object, nor can the necessary amount of money be raised. In my judgment, the scheme would be futile. That is not the way to advance the Christian religion. It would be a novelty for a little while, but after six months the novelty would wear off and the effect would be negligible."

Dr. Daniel A. Poling, associate president of Christian Endeavor, says: "With the general idea I am in hearty accord. It is one of the many big and prophetic things that the Interchurch Movement had hoped to promote."

Miss Dorothy Munson, Galesburg, Ill., believes the suggestions "savors some of an alliance between the Church and the world, and therefore could not be regarded with approval by earnest Christian men and women." Mrs. E. W. Turner of Round Lake, N. Y., and Viola M. Burghard, of Louisville, Ky., fear the effect of such a campaign would not be lasting. Rev. S. F. Wenger, of Dudley, Ill., doubts its practicability.

Mrs. Eliza E. Rideout, Amherst, Mass.: "The proposed plan seems to me wise if there can be found a person, or persons, truly inspired to prepare short, pointed articles sent forth with faith and prayer."

George M. Briggs, Turner, Me.: "I think such a campaign as Mr. Lewis urges would bring much good."

M. E. Cowles, Sugar Grove, Pa.: "If such a newspaper campaign could have the enthusiastic support of the churches generally and be conducted by men of sound judgment as well as earnest Christian spirit, such, for instance, as our editor-in-chief, I believe it might become a powerful agency for turning men's thoughts and hearts to God."

James Kelley, Winsted, Conn.: "I believe that something of this kind is needed and that such a campaign would be helpful."

Ida Parry, Highland Falls, N. Y.: "I have always felt that sensational advertising did little good and perhaps did harm."

P. G. Damrow, Flanagan, Ill.: "The pooling of resources of the different denominations seems objectionable to me, inasmuch as certain individuals took advantage of the Interchurch World Movement."

John J. Young, Williamsport, Pa.: "We are failing to take advantage of the great opportunity offered to us by the public press and all other advertising mediums to speak a word for Christianity. Nothing but good can come of your suggestions if they are well carried out."

Mrs. Drusilla M. Buffington, Evansville, Ind.: "If this could be done in His spirit, in His way and for His glory, I feel a great many could be reached. The whole thing hinges upon the manner in which it is done."

Dorinda Finds a Grandmother

for your disappointment, Keith, but it seems to have spelled luck for us."

The tall young man did not take his eyes from Dorinda's glowing face. "Well, I don't know about that, Mr. Hayden. I guess your lucky star and mine are twins tonight. But, say—I've only the open cutter—afraid you'll get some wet, but it isn't snowing quite so hard as it was."

Dorinda soon found herself cuddled down under a fur robe between the two men. She felt a sort of heady exhilaration, as the snow drifted under her little fur turban and pelted her cheeks with icy dabs.

"Warm enough, Dorinda?"

"Very comfortable, Dad, dear. Isn't it jolly? I—I'm not a bit sorry your uncle didn't come, Mr. Duncan."

"Neither am I. I keep thinking how glad the little lady will be to see you. I was in there a minute this morning. She was just taking a molasses cake out of the oven and insisted that I sample it. I sampled it all right!"

THEY turned in at a gateway and stopped before a long, low house. Light from the small-paned windows streamed across the pathway.

"Better come in with us, Keith."

"Oh—say—"

"Please, Mr. Duncan!" Dorinda unconsciously held out her hand.

"I would love to see Grandma Lyman's face."

They pushed the door open and went softly through a narrow, dark hall.

"Let me stay back," whispered Dorinda.

"Hello, there!"

Dorinda glimpsed a softly lighted, cozy, sitting-room, with old-fashioned furniture and big coal stove glowing warmly. Heard a sweet, gentle voice, "Why, Keith! We thought we heard sleighbells and some one at the door. Didn't your uncle come?"

"No—but some one else came."

James Hayden went forward.

"James! James! Look—Maggie—Amos—James is here! In all the snow—why, I don't understand—"

But Dorinda couldn't wait another minute.

"Grandmother!" she called. "Oh, Grandmother!" and she was in the center of the warmly lighted room, with both arms outstretched. She saw a sweet-faced, little, old lady, with snow-white hair and faded, tired looking, blue eyes.

The small figure stood rigid, her gaze riveted upon the radiant face of the young girl, then with a smothered cry, "Dorinda," she tottered forward and was caught and held close in the strong, loving arms of her granddaughter.

IT WAS two weeks since Dorinda had been whirled on the wings of storm into the little town of Brandon, and it had been a wonderful two weeks! Her father had returned to the city a few days after their arrival. "Now you've found your grandmother, don't forget that you still have a mother and a father, kiddie," he had said in parting.

But sometimes Dorinda came dangerously near forgetting. She was finding in her grandmother all those things which she had failed to find in her mother—tenderness, sweetness, a gentle timidity—qualities quite unknown to the arrogant Mrs. James Hayden.

Dorinda loved the quiet, homey, little town, the old-fashioned country house. She delighted to sit in the big spotless kitchen and pare apples while Maggie rolled out flaky pie-crust; and, enveloped in a huge gingham apron, she beat eggs and bowls of thick, yellow cream, and iced delicious chocolate cakes.

"I do declare, Miss Dorinda," exclaimed Maggie, "your grandmother looks twenty years younger since you came. I guess you'll have to live with her always."

"I hate the thought of going home," sighed the girl. "I'm having a glorious time!"

She was—and it couldn't be denied that Keith Duncan was helping to make it so. They went sleigh-riding, skating, tobogganing; they popped corn over the kitchen fire and made pans of fudge and molasses candy.

Sometimes looking at Keith, Dorinda would have a fleeting thought of the Honorable Roswell Dillingham. The comparison spoke not at all well for the H. R. D.

They were in the sitting-room and Keith was standing before the mantel. Beginning at one end and extending across were photographs of Dorinda. A starry-eyed baby; an adorable, irresistible little maiden of three; a trifle serious and self-conscious at ten, and so on, down the line, to the beautiful young lady in evening gown.

"I felt that I was sort of butting in," said Keith apologetically, "but when your father came and brought these photographs and I'd studied them a while, I knew I'd made no mistake. You see, everyone knows the kind of man Jim Hayden is, and when one day in a burst of confidence, your grandmother told me it was Jim Hayden that Isabel had married, I said right off, 'I don't believe he knows a thing about the little old lady.' So I went to see him, and sure enough he had never heard of her."

Dorinda turned her flushed face to the window. It was a bitter moment. "Dear grandmother—she's had so many hard things to bear all her life."

"Yes, but it's over now." Keith looked again at the array of photographs. "I've watched that look in your eyes, Dorinda, from the ten-year-old one, on through the line. I knew that some day you'd make up to your grandmother for all her years of unhappiness."

"There was one picture," said the girl a bit tremulous under his gaze, "the one before the last. I liked that one best of all. I wonder why Dad didn't bring that."

But Keith quickly changed the subject.

NOT often did Grandma Lyman speak of Isabel, but one day she looked long and thoughtfully at her granddaughter. "You look like your mother, dear," she said softly; then with a little sigh, "Poor Isabel!"

Dorinda threw back her head impatiently. "She had no right going off and leaving you as she did. How can you speak kindly of her?"

"Ah, my dear, you are blaming her too severely. I blame myself. If only I had been more assertive. Isabel has not one happy memory of—Brandon."

"But if it hadn't been for Keith Duncan's hunting up Father, just think, we might never have known about you."

"Keith has always been an impulsive lad," the little old lady picked up her knitting. "But his impulses are usually right. When his father was stricken with paralysis, he didn't hesitate a moment about leaving college and coming home to care for the old folks. Ah, yes, Keith is a lad in a thousand. He's always been so interested in those pictures of you, Dorinda. Whenever your father sent a new one, he'd always gaze and gaze at it. Now that one before the last—he did just like that one, and I finally gave it to him. You don't mind because I did, do you, granddaughter?" she asked with timid anxiety.

Dorinda did not lift her eyes from the book in her lap. "No, grandma," she breathed softly, "I don't mind—at all."

Unknown to Dorinda, her visit was fast drawing to a close. Looking out of the window one morning, she saw Keith running up the walk. At his unexpected appearance, her heart gave a queer little back-step, and a sudden precious knowledge brought the swift color to her cheeks.

"Keith—what on earth—?"

He took her hand in both of his and his usual merry, blue eyes were dark and troubled. "I've been talking long distance with your father, Dorinda. Your mother is ill—with pneumonia. He thinks you better come at once."

"Mother?" echoed Dorinda dazedly. "Mother—ill? Why, I've never known her to be really ill. Not—not seriously, Keith?"

"Well, I don't know. Pneumonia—you never can tell. Bad one minute and heaps better the next." He pulled out his watch. "You can make the ninety-thirty. Dorinda, I'll drive you down."

An hour later Dorinda was saying goodby to her grandmother. The little old lady was tremulously tearful. "Isabel, Isabel," she murmured. "How I wish I could go to her!"

"You are a saint, Grandmother," Dorinda held her close. "Yes, of course, I'll come again—just as soon as I can."

During the short drive to the station, Keith was strangely silent. He stared straight ahead, but all he saw was Dorinda's lovely troubled face. "Jim Hayden's daughter—Jim Hayden's daughter!" he thought rebelliously.

"How can he care for me?" thought Dorinda, bitterly. "A girl with a mother like mine."

"You'll come back, Dorinda?"

"Yes, Keith, of course I will. It's been the happiest two weeks I've ever known."

A FEW hours, and Dorinda was back in the city. Home! A strange home with nurses and doctors and a father a bit grayer, and quieter, and more tired looking. Just a glimpse into her mother's room. Was that her mother tossing and muttering incoherently and breathing such gasping, caught breaths?

Followed days and nights of nerve-tearing anxiety, then the crisis passed and Dorinda could go in and hold her mother's hand for a moment and smile reassuringly. Somehow, it didn't seem a bit like her mother, that sweet, white-faced woman. There was a different expression in her eyes, a questioning, longing expression. It tore at Dorinda's heartstrings.

One day she looked up and saw that her mother's eyes were filled with tears. "Dorinda, come here," she said. "Tell me about—about your grandmother."

Wonderingly, Dorinda told a little of her visit to Brandon. "And you needn't feel ashamed of Grandmother," she added a bit defiantly. "She's not poor or uneducated. She's a perfect darling."

Isabel Hayden covered her face with her hands. "Oh, don't, Dorinda!" she cried sharply. "I've been wicked—hard—unforgiving. When I was so ill suddenly it came to me, what if I should die with all those selfish, lying years upon my soul. Forgive me, Dorinda, I've been a bad mother to you, but to my mother—oh, she can never forgive me!"

Dorinda put her arms about her mother's heaving shoulders. "Oh, my dear, my dear! Forgive you? You do not know Grandmother. Her last words to me as I came away were, 'If I could only go to Isabel.'"

The woman threw out her hand with a wild, sweet cry. "Send for her, Dorinda, oh—send for her to come!"

IT WAS Keith Duncan who brought Grandma Lyman to the Hayden home. He waited in the long drawing-room until Dorinda came down the stairs.

The girl's eyes were wet. "I just opened the door and pushed Grandmother in," she said shakily, "and I came right away. Oh, Keith, I'm so happy!"

Jim Hayden's daughter! Jim Hayden's daughter!

"It was dear of you to come down with Grandma. I told mother about you this morning," she added shyly. "She wants to see you."

Dorinda's barrier had been burned away. She wasn't ashamed of her mother any longer.

He looked at her miserably. "I suppose your grandmother will come here to live now, and you—you'll never come to Brandon again."

Dorinda bravely stepped across the chasm. "Would you—care, Keith?" she asked sweetly.

He forgot that she was Jim Hayden's daughter, forgot everything in the wonderful revelation of her lovely, flushed face. "Care? Oh, Dorinda!"

James Hayden paused for a moment in the doorway, then he tip-toed softly up the stairs to his wife's room, but after a glance in there, he moved away again, across the hall to his den. He sank down in his big, easy-chair. The tired look had quite gone from his eyes and in its place was the smile of great content.

The Progress of Relief in China

WITH famine in China at its most acute stage—with reports of 1000 deaths daily in Honan province alone—increasing efforts are being made in America to meet the urgency of the situation. Most recent advices from relief headquarters in China disclose that the work of famine relief has reached the half-way mark—that is, through the combined efforts of American, Chinese, and all other relief agencies, rather more than half the people in greatest need in the famine area have been relieved in some degree. There still remain fully 5,000,000 in dire need who have received no assistance whatever. The millions who have been fed must continue to be fed, and every effort must be made to reach those 5,000,000 terribly destitute ones to whom no assistance has been given.

The Chinese in China are doing all in their power to alleviate the distress of their countrymen.

Of all the efforts for famine relief, none naturally is of greater interest to readers of the Christian Herald than the reports of the good which their own contributions are accomplishing.

The list of grants, reported at the January meeting in Kaifeng, Honan, was as follows:

Mrs. H. M. Clark, Wu An, Honan, for expectant and nursing mothers	$500.00
Miss E. Lily Armitt, United Methodist Mission, Chu Chia Chai, for starving Christians and general relief	1,000.00
Miss Paula Ritter, Liu Ming Kuan, Chihli, for general relief	1,000.00

The Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

AN UNUSUAL number of letters from different states have been received this week, containing requests for prayer and recording answers to prayer. These have all been sent to the Christian Herald Prayer League to be submitted for prayer and for thanksgiving, as the writers request.

Mr. George Tester, of the Ebenezer Prayer Watch, asks prayers in behalf of the proposed "Missionary Guest Home," where workers from the Lord's Vineyard may come and spend their furlough. He writes: "I am glad to tell you that we have secured new headquarters at 1098 Bresee Ave., Pasadena, facing the Sierra Mountains."

Mrs. T. A. N., Bethel, N. Y., writes: "I request prayers for our Sunday school which has died out; the workers have grown cold and indifferent. Also pray for a revival in our neighborhood."

"I feel that I need the prayers of the League, with my own, for so many things," writes Mrs. G. B., Sharon, Wis. "Our church here at Sharon is about to begin a series of meetings and we want you to pray with us for spiritual uplift for our community as well as for a revival for our church."

"I wish to ask prayers for a revival in all of the churches in our city," writes Mrs. B. F. P., Dinton, Tex.; and Miss R. W. asks special prayers for the church and community at Cottonton, Ala.

A. G. McNeely, Spokane, Wash., writes: "We are planning for a revival for our city. Will you insert in the prayer column our request for prayer for the Holy Spirit of God to work mightily in Spokane?"

A sister in Centerville, Mich., asks an interest in the Prayer League in behalf of her church—"that a true man of God may be sent to us as pastor to carry on the good work begun."

Mrs. E. K. P., Danville, Ill., writes: "Will you please pray for the restoration to health of a returned missionary doctor. Her hospital is closed. They are needing her help. Patients come many miles to find the hospital closed. Flu, cholera, and various diseases of the Orient are hindering the other missionaries in their work. Also please pray that the missionaries of the W. F. M. S. of the M. E. Church may be restored and sent back to their various fields. And we would also like to have you remember in prayer the revival which we are conducting in Danville, Ill."

From a member in Massachusetts, comes this note: "It is said that 'while they are yet speaking I will answer.' This was the case when my son, so weak from the 'flu' on shipboard, prayed for someone to help him move to his hammock. Before the thought was breathed, a fine young man said: 'Buddy, are you sick? Let me help you.' And his life was saved. Now I have a bill which must be paid at once, and I know not from whence the money will come. I ask for divine assistance."

Mrs. L. C. asks prayers for her only son, for recovery from a nervous disease; also that her husband may have greater faith in God's love. She adds: "A sister has been wonderfully restored to health since asking help from the Prayer League. I am a firm believer in prayer."

Miss M. P., Chicago, Ill., says: "I have been an interested reader of the Christian Herald. In the Prayer League I have read over and over of the blessed answers to prayer. It has put a spirit into me that I can not explain. I want to ask that you add to your prayer list, my sister. Won't you ask for her conversion, that her priceless soul may be won for the Master?"

Among the general requests are: For bodily healing, 160; conversion of relatives and friends, 101; blessing, 25; financial aid, 24; courage, 4; reunion, 10; guidance, 14; peace, 10; faith, 16; forgiveness, 4; and spiritual advancement, 11; also 21 requests known only to God.

M. S., Ellis Grove, Ill., writes: "A few months ago I asked the praying people to unite with me in prayer for my sister who was then lying very sick with an old chronic disease. I now wish to acknowledge God's goodness, and to say that the petition sent to the Heavenly Father in her behalf was most wonderfully answered. This beautiful demonstration strengthens my belief that 'the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous and his ears are open unto their prayers.'"

Mrs. E. E., Ohio, writes: "Some time ago I requested prayers in behalf of my grandson. I have good news to communicate. He came home from Sunday school and said he is going to join the church on Easter Sunday."

We have also received acknowledgments of answered prayers from Mrs. R. McD., Mrs. S., L. E., P. T., Believer, Mrs. J. W. G., E. H., L. D. J., Mrs. J. H., Reader, and S. H. P.

Many Thousand Admirers of AMELIA E. BARR

Read the Christian Herald

They know the sterling worth of her writings as evidenced by the thousands of her books they have purchased from the Christian Herald book department. We are glad to announce that we have received from her publishers a special edition of her collected song stories under the title of

Songs in the Common Chord

By AMELIA E. BARR

This fine cloth bound book is sold regularly for $1.50 a copy and has not been sold for less.

We are able to offer to renewing subscribers for only 75c a copy

JUST ONE-HALF THE PRICE

This is the last volume to come from the pen of Amelia E. Barr, whose recent death bereaved a wide public of one of its best beloved authors. "Songs in the Common Chord," is a collection of 163 simple, heart-felt poems selected by Mrs. Barr herself as the best of her verse. While these poems were never before published in book form they have appeared in magazines and newspapers everywhere and some of them such as "The Old Piano," "The Great Happiness," and "Help," are known throughout the country. There is nothing highbrow about Mrs. Barr's verse. It is the simple, direct, "homey" sort of poetry that goes straight to the reader's heart. Undoubtedly Mrs. Barr's many admirers will have a warm welcome and will maintain a steady demand for these, her last songs. Joseph C. Lincoln, the author of "Shavings" and other successful novels, has written an appealing preface to the volume.

In the 295 pages will be found 163 of the best of Mrs. Barr's poems and a fine portrait of the author.

All admirers of Mrs. Barr's writings should add this volume to their libraries.

Renewing subscribers to the Christian Herald at $2.00 should add 75c to their remittance, $2.75 in all, and subscription will be extended for a year, 52 weeks, and a copy of the book "Songs in the Common Chord" sent postpaid. The book sold separately for $1.25.

Thy Kingdom Come—In My Country

C. E., B. Y. P. U. and E. L. Matt. 6:7-15
(Consecration Meeting)

THUS far we have been discussing the Kingdom's coming in our hearts, homes, churches and our communities. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is inclusive of all our relationships. Beginning with the individual it widens until it embraces every phase of thought and action. Christian America is our goal at last because Christian America is our objective in the beginning. This brings us face to face with individual responsibility. If every individual in our land were truly in the Kingdom of God, then our country would be in the kingdom. It is impossible to have a barrel of perfect apples composed of individually imperfect apples. The more individual perfection we attain the nearer we are to be collective perfection of our ideal.

Make this a patriotic meeting. Base the study on the Pilgrim Ideals. Seek definitions of that phrase "For conscience's sake" and relate it to our country's splendid beginnings, as you find great personalities and mighty movements in the pages of history. Sing patriotic songs. Whittier has given us that wonderful "Centennial Hymn," and Kipling has given us his "Recessional." Have somebody tell the significance of our flag as follows:

The thirteen stripes emphasize the worth of individuality and of unity. They represent those thirteen little colonies that bravely fought and suffered and sacrificed and remained true. Its stars recognize each individual state, added from time to time, through the worth of each and the right of each to be recognized as a factor in making our nation great. The uniting of these stripes into one and the placing of these stars in the blue field give beauty to our flag and make it symbolic of the union of these individuals into one. The color white stands for purity and unselfishness of motive; blue for the staunchness of purposes; red for the spirit of sacrifice to attain the goal. For the starry field shall we not say that it is a recognition that there can be no union unless heaven comes down and purifies our nation?

A flag to represent such ideals must have a strong foundation if it is not to be displaced. But the flag is but a symbol. Words are only representative. Ideals are only guiding principles. Unless the things for which the flag stands, the words of patriotism and religion that are representative, and ideals that are guideposts are lived and wrought in human action, they mean very little, if anything.

Mexico's Unplumbed Chasm

(who were the remains of the intellectuals who had supported Madero), sycophants and without background of education, morals or religion, and below them the vast misery of the unthinking serfs of the country, duller, certainly sadder and even less well nourished, than in the days of the viceroys and of Diaz. In those days there was aristocracy, with all its faults, and that same mass of human flotsam, but there was also the field for work and for improvement, and slowly, with the limitations of that far-off era before the Great War, they were doing what they could see to do. I would not go back to that day, and if I would, one cannot. Even the faults of that aristocracy would be impossible even in them now. But these newer faults—I do not know.

WE ARE all responsible for the Mexico that is before us. The Americans of every class in that old Mexico were too willing to let the misery of Mexico be what it was, were too willing to take our helpers and our support from the middle class that was emerging so slowly. We made a fetish of that middle class, built our hope of Mexico upon it, called it the crowning achievement of the age of Diaz, and from it came the Mexican Protestants and the beginnings of that group of Mexican leaders of which we all had dreamed. We saw Diaz clear—all of us, I think—and knew that his day could not be forever. But we had faith in that middle class, forgetting as it was easy to forget, the instability of that foundation of Indian poverty and misery. We were going to save that by bringing it up to the examples of its brothers—artisans and clerks and students and teachers. We trusted so blindly, then, in the heaven of example—we knew so little of the shifting sands of utter ignorance beneath our feet.

And then came the day of revolution. Madero the deliverer. There were few of us who regretted the passing of Diaz, save sentimentally, that it should have to be in just that way—we had hoped he would die gloriously, beloved by the people for whom he had given so much. And then the disappointment and the horror, of that wild cabal of graft and loot under Madero, when the dreamers, the repressed brains of a generation, stood waiting, wringing their hands in helpless impotence—those who could, truly, have done so much! It was pitiful, as was also the aftermath of Huerta, that reaction, that impossible reaction with its ugly tinge of a coming uprush of Indian barbarism.

Then Carranza, riding upon the winged horse of Madero—it seems that not all of us understood, quite, for we heard the fair words, as we have heard them echoing through empty halls and across dead and tortured bodies these five years since. Many sincere men were caught by those fair, echoing words, and many followed the phantom to the end. And many continue to this day.

I have no need to talk of the recent past, nor of the present. The story is written in the starving babies of Mexican towns, in the dismal railway stations where wretched food can be bought from the very mouths of hungry, filthy vendors. Pity and grief and pain stalk in Mexico today. Somewhere those who have used these skeletons, as infinite in number, as minute in importance in a money-mad world as the skeletons of a coral reef, for climbing to wealth and power—somewhere those must make answer.

And from somewhere, too, the solution of the interlaced problems must come, and from somewhere it is coming, I believe. That is the ray of hope, a ray that does not shine brightly in Mexico today—not yet. And that is still another story.

The World News of the Week

the other unions in support of the miners would verge on revolution. Government officials minimized the danger of a general strike, but labor leaders were bitter because of their belief that the officials were siding with the employers and were in a frame of mind for a finished conflict.

PANAMA REJECTS WHITE AWARD. The National Assembly of Panama unanimously upheld a refusal by the foreign office to accept the White award as a basis for settlement of the boundary dispute with Costa Rica, and declared its readiness to accept whatever consequences might ensue. The action was in reply to the American note urging such a settlement.

NEW ELECTIONS ORDERED IN ITALY. The King of Italy has dissolved the Chamber of Deputies and called general elections for May 15, former Premier Giolitti having convinced him that the Chamber did not represent the present views of the people. Parliament is to reopen June 8.

NEW YORK ASSEMBLY REFUSES TO OUST SOCIALISTS. The New York Assembly by large majorities has refused to oust two members—Charles Solomon and Samuel Orr—who had been ousted twice before because of their membership in the Socialist party. It was explained that the party had amended its constitution so as to eliminate propositions "inimical to the good of the government."

FRANCE LOSES POPULATION. Early returns of the 1921 census of France show a loss of 5.7 per cent. in population since the 1911 census. Paris was believed to have made a great growth, but the official figures revealed virtually no increase.

HERRICK TO BE AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE. Myron T. Herrick, who was Ambassador to France from early in 1912 until near the close of 1914, has decided to accept that appointment again, and it is expected he will go to Paris early in the summer.

MANNING CONSECRATION SET FOR MAY 6. The date for the consecration of Dr. William T. Manning as Protestant Episcopal Bishop of New York has been set for May 6, a majority of the Bishops having approved his election.

EGYPTIANS WELCOME NATIONAL HERO. Saad Zaghlul Pasha, noted leader for Egyptian independence, was greeted by crowds estimated at 1,000,000 on his return to Cairo after two years in Europe. Tens of thousands of natives came from all parts of the country to cheer him and perfect order was maintained, the British troops keeping to their barracks for the day to avoid friction.

Vapo-Cresolene

Established 1879

The time for Vapo-Cresolene is at the first indication of a cold or sore throat, which are so often the warnings of dangerous complications.

It is simple to use, as you just light the little lamp that vaporizes the Cresolene and place it near the bed at night.

The soothing antiseptic vapor is breathed all night; making breathing easy, relieving the cough and easing the sore throat and congested chest.

Cresolene is recommended for Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Influenza, Bronchitis, Coughs, and Nasal Catarrh. Its germicidal qualities make it a reliable protection against these epidemics.

It gives great relief in Asthma.

Cresolene has been recommended and used for the past forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

Sold by Druggists. Send for Descriptive Booklet 66

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the Irritated Throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c in stamps.

What a Dime Will bring You From the Nation's Capital

The little matter of 10 cts. will bring you the Pathfinder eight weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for all the Nation; an independent home paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth; now in its 28th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, strongly, briefly—here it is. Send 10c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation eight weeks. The 10c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. Address: THE PATHFINDER, 4201 Langdon St., Washington, D.C.

Washington has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder is like sitting in the inner council with those who mold the world's destiny.

A Gift of $100 For Your Church

The Christian Herald will give your church $100.00 or even more. More than $50,000.00 in all is to be given away and this is your opportunity to secure a share of it for your church.

Ministers everywhere endorse the plan highly. Surely your church could use an extra $100.00 or $150.00 at this time. Perhaps there is a new organ to be bought, or a carpet to be replaced or new hymnals to be secured. Possibly there are repairs which should be made, re-decorating which should be done or a church debt to be paid. Churches have used the Christian Herald Plan for all of these purposes.

Does Your Church Need Money?

If your church could use extra money you should certainly write at once to find out about the Christian Herald Plan. Ministers and Ministers' wives, Sunday School Superintendents and Teachers, Presidents of Ladies Aid and Young Peoples Societies, this is particularly your opportunity. Every single Church Worker actively interested in his or her church should be sure to find out about this.

Think how proud you will be that it was you who took the first step, toward securing $100.00 or $150.00 for your church. There will be no expense of any sort or any obligation either on your part or that of your church so feel free to write for full details at once and they will be sent you immediately.

Questions and Answers

REV. HERVEY WOOD sends us this from a correspondent in Bombay, India, which shows that prohibition has warm advocates even among other religionists: "The Mohammedans of Bombay, India, are conducting a unique 'dry campaign.' The Koran forbids Mohammedans to use strong drink, but many of them are violating this law. These reformers are picketing the principal saloons of Bombay and any Mohammedan who comes out of a saloon is seized and led through the streets, with cries of 'Shame!' The movement is spreading to other cities. In some aspects it recalls the Women's Crusade in America. A man belonging to the 'sweeper' caste was found drunk. His caste-fellows seized him, garlanded him with old shoes and marched him through the bazaars to the beating of empty oil tins. Several castes have adopted resolutions forbidding their members to touch liquor upon penalty of ostracism."

Mrs. W. D. M. The great temperance wave has spread farther than must people appear to understand. It may even be said, as your friend claims, that it has well-nigh circled the globe. Professor Rankin, in the Presbyterian, notes these facts in this connection: Among the South American peoples, Argentina is in the midst of a national "wet" and "dry" struggle: Guatemala closed all its saloons at the late election, to ensure a sane and sober vote; Uruguay is teaching its school children to fight the evils of drink. India has an organized Student Movement for world prohibition. Sweden has a government Commission to deal with the drink problem. The Polish Republic has passed a law giving power to the people to prohibit the sale of all liquors containing more than 2½ per cent. of alcohol. The Fiji Islands have petitioned Britain for prohibition. South Africa has just established temperance teaching in its colleges and schools. These are only a few of many such indications of world progress.

Mrs. B. V., Dundee, Oreg. Barabbas was a political prisoner, an agitator, who had committed murder in an insurrection. Barnabas, the disciple, was quite another person. Originally named Joses (Acts 4:36) he received from the disciples the name of Barnabas, which means "the son of exhortation" (or of prophetic declarations and utterances). Originally a Levite, and a man of superior education and talents, with a gentle disposition, he was one of Paul's intimate friends.

J. B., Philadelphia. Sovietism has been defined as the principle of forcing the hand of governments by mass action instead of by the vote, or, to use plainer terms, seizing power by force and governing by compulsion. Bolshevism has its most practical illustration in the abolition of property rights and the regulating of the lives of the people in all things, by a directing machine, which enforces its will by compulsion.

L. M. G., Greensburg, Ind. We are to pray at all times "according to His will." Our Heavenly Father knows what is best for us, and if we trust Him fully, he will lead us to understand the wisdom of submission. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

J. J. B., Dallas, Tex. The expressions "Kingdom of God" and "Kingdom of Heaven" are used in different senses in the Bible. At times "Kingdom of God" means the entire universe; again "Kingdom of Heaven" is applied to the celestial regions, where divine Majesty is enthroned. In their teachings, the old rabbis made the distinction of three heavens, viz.: the firmament, the starry heavens beyond, and the "heaven of heavens," which Christ called the house of His Father. Besides, the phrase "Kingdom of Heaven" is frequently used in Scripture to denote the rule of Christ which is set up in the hearts of men -- "the Kingdom of Heaven is within you."

J. E. H., Bridges, S. Dak. As to the burials in the cave of Machpelah, the family burying-ground which Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite (Gen. 23:9) the persons mentioned in Scripture as being interred there are Abraham, Isaac and Jacob with their wives, Sara, Rebekah and Leah. (Gen. 23:19, 25:9, 49:31). Nearby is a little building said to contain the tomb of Joseph.

A reader in Washington, D. C., writes us in behalf of a small evangelical church, on the Virginia side of the Potomac river, which was built by volunteer members at night after the day's work was over. They have no pulpit furniture. The members of the little country church would be glad to hear of any church having old or used pulpit furniture that might be available, either as a gift or at a price within their means. Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

A Beautiful Book and a Beautiful Story

THE COMPLETE STANDARD LIFE OF CHRIST

By CANON FARRAR, D. D., F. R. S., Dean of Canterbury

Beautifully illustrated with over 350 reproductions of the world's most famous paintings

The Christian Herald takes great pleasure in announcing that it has secured an option to take two large editions of the great standard work described on this page and at pre-war prices. It proposes to pass on to its readers the benefit of this splendid opportunity to secure a copy of Farrar's Life of Christ beautifully illustrated and at a price hitherto not deemed possible. Read the description and the large clear type. Illustrated.

Offered in two sizes.

The theme of this story has appealed to the greatest artists in the world, and they have painted marvellous pictures of scenes and incidents in Christ's most wonderful life. The greatest of these paintings are reproduced in this book by photography, and together they constitute THE WORLD'S GREATEST ART GALLERY. Estimated at the total value of the originals there would be over in this one book alone. Many of the originals could not be bought at any price. No other book on this subject contains so many famous pictures by so many famous artists.

IT COMBINES THE MOST PERFECT LITERATURE WITH THE MOST PERFECT ART

It appeals to all that is best and noblest in the natures of men and women. It is a GREAT BOOK FOR CHILDREN—even those who are too young to read can learn from it the beautiful life of the Saviour who said, "suffer little children to come unto me," by studying the great paintings reproduced by the half-tone process from photographs which illustrate every phase of LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND, with particular reference to THE CHILDHOOD OF JESUS.

The fame of Frederic William Farrar, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Canterbury, author of "The Life of Christ," is secure. He is conceded to be one of the most learned theologians. This work has become standard in the Christian world.

OVER 350 REPRODUCTIONS OF FAMOUS PAINTINGS APPEAR IN THIS 725 PAGE BOOK

Every great art gallery in the world contains one or more great paintings of some great event in the life of Christ.

This book contains photographs of the greatest paintings of the Saviour in all the great Art Galleries of the World, with a complete index of the famous artists and sketches of their lives.

Time and money have been expended freely in order to make the collection of beautiful pictures the most complete gallery of religious paintings ever produced in a book at a popular price.

The intelligence is more quickly and surely educated by pictures than by description, yet in this book the work of one of THE GREATEST RELIGIOUS WRITERS of the age is combined with the work of THE GREATEST RELIGIOUS PAINTERS. This rare combination of the best in literature and art has created a wonderful demand for this book. Think of being able to get a copy for only 75c. additional to the cost of the Christian Herald for a year, $2.75 in all.

How to Get It

Farrar's Life of Christ is in two sizes:

Style "A" is 6 x 8½ inches, 1½ inches thick.

We offer a copy of this edition and the Christian Herald for one year (52 weeks) both postpaid for $2.75. Style "A" book separately, postpaid for $1.50.

Style "B" is a larger book, size 7 x 9¼ inches, 1¾ inches thick.

We offer a copy of this edition and the Christian Herald for one year (52 weeks) both postpaid for $3.25. Style "B" book separately, postpaid for $2.00.

Be sure to mention style desired. The only difference is in the size. The binding is fine cloth embossed in colors and gold.

Our New World Policy

President Harding's Message to Congress Withdraws America into National Shell of Isolation

By RAE D. HENKLE

THE new American foreign policy as outlined by President Harding in his first message to the Congress elected with him may be summed up about as follows:

1. The United States will join an association of nations for the preservation of world peace provided there are no obligations resting on us beyond an observance of the rules of international law.
2. The United States will accept the Versailles treaty after eliminating completely the League of Nations Covenant and making some other revisions which are not yet fully defined. In the meantime a declaratory resolution of peace with the Central Powers will be passed by Congress. This motion will put us technically at peace with Germany and formally permit the resumption of trade and other relations, but in all other respects our rights as a belligerent under the Versailles treaty will be preserved.
3. The United States will join with other nations in a comparative disarmament program, but will not disarm first.

Beyond these major points we are committed to a sympathetic co-operation with Europe to solve the economic problems that are pressing so heavily on the continent and interfering so seriously with the restoration of normal world trade relationships. This commercial interest is specifically divorced from political and nationalistic problems which are peculiar to Europe and in which, the President declares, we can have no active participation.

So, after nearly four years of idealistic leadership in the concert of nations, we withdraw into our national shell of isolation only to emerge, as one cynical observer phrases it, "as a bully to guard our check book." I do not sympathize with the characterization, and I am confident it will never be justified by events. But one thing is certain. The American people for the moment have cut themselves adrift from the rest of the world, have shaken from their shoulders the responsibility voluntarily placed there by their participation in the war and in the European peace which followed, and have retained as their interest in the affairs of Europe only those portions of the treaty of peace which preserve strictly American rights. This despite Mr. Harding's assurance that:

"Our obligations in effecting European tranquillity, because of war's involvements, are not less impelling than our part in the war itself. This restoration must be wrought before the human procession can go onward again. We can be helpful because we are moved by no hatreds and harbor no fears. Helpfulness does not mean entanglement and participation in economic adjustments does not mean sponsorship for treaty commitments which do not concern us and in which we will have no part."

Just what the result will be no person can foretell. Just as politics has governed a great deal of the discussion of post-war problems, so politics will continue, in large measure, to control the development of any foreign program on which we embark.

DURING the month following inauguration and before the beginning of the extra session in Congress, statements were issued from Washington with the utmost regularity, all indicating what on the surface seemed to be the policy we would elect to pursue. They came from the most authoritative sources, including President Harding himself. Apparently, they were put out as "feelers" in order to learn the reaction of the public toward them. By their use every effort was made to reconcile a large number of opposing opinions that would permit divergent elements in the cabinet, the various groups in Congress, and the lay leaders of public thought, to unite on some one general policy which could be accepted by the majority. How far the administration has succeeded in accomplishing this purpose remains to be seen, but the result of the manoeuvre is comprised in the Harding message of April 12.

One of the most regrettable features of the message was the failure of the President to do more than generalize on principles. He stated the position the administration will assume, but he omitted any recommendation or suggestion as to how his program is to be made effective and here, many observers believe, is its very heart. He promises to negotiate a treaty which will satisfy the requirements of the United States, but in no way does he indicate the methods to be adopted, or the processes of negotiation. The treaty agreed on at Versailles was signed by the five principal allied and associated Powers, by twenty-two other allied States and by Germany. Certainly, no American Secretary of State was ever faced with a broader or more highly varied field of negotiation.

Our acceptance of the peace treaty is contingent on the removal from it, bodily, of the League of Nations covenant. This covenant is interwoven through almost every clause of the treaty and so is a part and parcel of it. President Harding has assumed responsibility for approaching these twenty-eight nations, which have affixed their signatures to the document, with a proposal that they reconsider it as a whole and accept what will amount to a new draft prepared by the United States. How much time would be required to accomplish this, even in the most favorable circumstances, can only be conjectured. Certainly, however, only the most optimistic could anticipate that all of these states, having the closest possible direct interest in the treaty as promulgated, could ever be brought to approve our radical revision of the instrument.

CAN we imagine the assent of France, which is now firmly lodged along the Rhine, or Poland with its big territorial concessions, or England with its Asiatic mandates, or Japan with its grip on Shantung and the North Pacific islands? Our knowledge of world politics, in fact, makes us extremely pessimistic over the prospect of any such conclusion to whatever negotiations we may be able to initiate. This all means that while technical peace with Germany seems to be a probability of the near future, established peace is a remote consummation. To bring about a state of technical peace, the famous Knox resolution, which was vetoed by President Wilson last year, has been again introduced into the Senate, with slight modifications. A small group of the Republican members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had hoped in this resolution to enunciate a very definite foreign policy, which should carry to the world a national policy as concrete and far-reaching as the Monroe Doctrine. President Harding frankly warned these Senators, however, that while he sympathizes fully with the prerogatives of the Senate and will defer to that body in all matters that, constitutionally, belong to it, there are certain prerogatives of the executive on which he will insist and that the initiation and negotiation of treaties and matters of foreign policy are essentially in this category. At the last minute, therefore, the Knox resolution was pared down to a bare declaration of peace and a provision securing to the United States all the rights and benefits accruing to it as a belligerent under the terms of the armistice and the subsequent treaty of Versailles. The same resolution also repeals the declaration of war against Austria-Hungary.

So far as observers in Washington are able to learn, the President's present plan is to name and send abroad a commission headed probably by Elihu Root and including one or more members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. This commission will be charged with the task of conferring with European foreign offices and reaching some understanding which will eventuate in a new international conference, at which the American representatives can re-submit the treaty with the eliminations and reservations which will make it conform to the administration program. It is believed an effort will be made to have this conference called either in Washington or some other American city and that the occasion will be made one for not only revising the treaty and wrecking the League of Nations, but for developing a new association of nations along a line that will be acceptable to the large group in and out of the Senate, which is so strongly opposed to the league as at present constituted. In other words, an association largely for discussion, but without legislative or plenary authority.

This, undoubtedly, would mean in effect the re-drafting of the Hague Convention on the basis of new principles of international law as developed out of the experiences of the World War. It would be an association without power to enforce its findings and, to all intents and purposes, would be a refined or sub-limited board of arbitration for international disputes. In this, we would be simply developing the arbitra-tional policy laid down by President Roosevelt, carried forward by President Taft and Mr. Root, while the latter was Secretary of State in the Taft Cabinet, and elaborated by Mr. Bryan in the early days of the Wilson administration. Disarmament conversations would have an important part in this conference. But Mr. Harding, obviously, does not anticipate, at any time, complete disarmament. He is willing to enter into negotiations for "comparative" disarmament, but he is fixed in his determination that the United States shall not disarm first.

FOREIGN comment on the message has taken a very uncertain tone. Most of it has been exceedingly caustic, with an inclination to withhold final judgment until the events of the next few weeks show just what the President has in his mind. It seems to be the consensus, however, that the United States has definitely washed its hands of any further world obligations. Considerable resentment has been shown in both England and Japan, particularly because of our insistence, through communications sent by Secretary of State Hughes to London, Paris, Rome and Tokio, that the United States will not recognize the validity of mandates granted by the League of Nations Council to which this country has not given its approval. The feeling seems to be that the world cannot be expected to stand still while the United States makes up its mind what its future relationships will be. It is pointed out that we are not members of the League of Nations, despite the fact that we signed the treaty of peace; that we have no representatives in the League and that we cannot presume to dictate to the membership what action it should take on any problem that comes up for deliberation.

Republicans of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee who called at the White House a few hours before the President delivered his message. Left to right are Senators Lodge, Borah, Brandegee, Johnson, New, Moses, McCormick, McCumber and Kellogg

France, thus far, has shown a more conciliating spirit, although there is a great deal of disquietude among the representative French people. This disquietude was one of the reasons for the despatch to this country of René Viviani, as special commissioner for the purpose of presenting to the new administration the respects of France and to induce the government to a friendly attitude toward French aspirations. France has never been a warm friend of the League of Nations idea and it is probable that there will be no deep grief in Paris at the collapse of the organization, provided certain assurances could be obtained for support for France in the event of another emergency.

The fact unfortunately, is, however that France probably will be left between two stools. We have repudiated the League of Nations and we have declined to consummate the Franco-American defensive alliance, which was one of the documents brought back from Paris by President Wilson at the insistence of M. Clemenceau. The situation, then, has left France in a very confused mental condition. There is quite a bit of feeling against the United States because it has been an open secret that France only entered the League because she thought this country was wholeheartedly committed to it. Even then, doubting the effectiveness of the idea when applied to practical international politics, M. Clemenceau made it one of the conditions of French acceptance that the United States and England enter into separate treaties with France, protecting her against a revival of German military strength and such an emergency as confronted her in 1914.

That much-discussed Island of Yap

The human gun-carriage

NOW, if the Republican majority in Washington has its way, France will have neither the league nor an alliance. Her only satisfaction rests on the assurance that whatever peace arrangements the United States makes with the Allies, the material interests of France will be protected. As the editor of one of the prominent Paris newspapers said:

"The League of Nations once rejected, Mr. Harding desires, nevertheless, an association of nations responding to the need universally recognized. Perhaps soon we shall know more about this idea. In the meantime, unfortunate Europe must content itself with what it has."

So far as Germany is concerned, the leaders apparently do not know what construction to put on the new program. They received small consolation from the President's reiteration of Germany's responsibility for the war and his assurance of sympathy with the allies seeking to collect reparations. There is an obvious hope expressed that in the negotiations now forecast, the influence of the United States will be used to lighten in some measure the burdens the German State is shouldering now. French commentators, however, are unable to read in any other developments here, basis for such a hope. As another French editor says: "There remain accounts to be settled between Germany and the people she attacked. They are reparation accounts. In this matter, American policy, as expressed by the message of President Harding, is clear as crystal. Germany ought to repair. The Allies, and above all France, the principal creditor, have carte blanche to go ahead and collect."

The American people are eager and anxious to learn, with some definiteness, how President Harding intends to validate his policies.

Lacking a few days, it is two years since the historic occasion when the great nations of the world gathered around a table in the Versailles Palace and affixed their signatures to the Treaty of Peace. The treaty has not brought peace except in a very limited sense. War between Germany and the Allies ceased, but there are today conflicts in various parts of the world growing directly out of the document which was so solemnly approved on that day in the environments of Paris. More wars are almost certain. Provisions admittedly unfair and unjust are certain to reflect their influence for years to come. Our responsibility for this condition should not be minimized, but while we are responsible for the fact, we have not been willing to assume responsibility for devising a remedy.

If President Harding, now that the majority of the country has definitely repudiated the work of President Wilson, can by negotiation bring real peace, the country will be partly satisfied. Regardless of the results of the November election, the nation as a whole did not repudiate the League idea. It opposed some of the provisions of the document and favored certain revisions; but the great body of the American people, awakened to its world position and world opportunities, is thoroughly committed to an association or society of nations, which will be more than a debating society. It wants a medium through which can be translated into terms of international relationship the American demand for permanent peace, justice and good-will.

Remarkable Lakes I Have Seen

Four Beauty Spots in Far Corners of the World

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

WHEN you come to think of it, what a thing of joy is a lake, whether large or small! my heart bounds as I think of some of the New Hampshire lakes—ponds we used to call them—where as a boy I “wet a line,” in the familiar phrase of an old fisherman. There is something fascinating and mysterious about a lake. There it lies, wood-encircled, reflecting heaven’s blue or the sun’s gold in the heart of the forest, now smooth as a mirror, now ruffled with the breeze, now raging with the tempest.

Who can tell what is going on beneath that calm or angry surface? Fishes, little and big, are doubtless swimming there. Slimy, greasy things perhaps are crawling on the bottom. An entirely new flora, as well as fauna, is there, which we never see on dry land. Plants and shrubs flourish under those ripples, which never appear above them.

A lake is a thing to love, if it is small enough, so that you can take it all in at a glance—or at least if you can see the farther shore. I cannot love the ocean, though I have heard many people say they did. But the ocean seems too big, too monstrous, to love. I can admire it, fear it, be amazed at it, but I cannot love it. But a lake or pond is different. It is cozy, comfortable, understandable, lovable.

Lake Superior or Lake Michigan or any other of the well-named “great lakes” is like the sea—too big and grand to love, but who does not remember some quiet, natural bowl in the woods, full to the brim of sweet water? The banks rise gently from the edge of the bowl, and on its rim is a sandy beach, with little flowers and plants that like moisture, decking the shores. The black alders, with their red berries in the autumn, line its banks, and flags and bushes full of fluffy balls of down rejoice in it. The willows love it too, and so does the red-winged blackbird, and the sand-piper. The catbird likes it for her nesting place, and the turtles enjoy nothing so well as to sun themselves on a half-sunken log and then slide off “cachunk,” into the water, when one approaches. All homely, gentle things, animate and inanimate, love a pond, and I, for one, admire their taste.

But these are not the lakes I set out to write about. There are four very different ones which I have seen that seem to me most remarkable for one reason or another. They are Lake Titicaca in Bolivia, Lake Baikal in Siberia, one especially hot lake, among many in New Zealand, and the Lake of Galilee.

THE first of this quartette is especially remarkable for its altitude. Think of a great body of water, one hundred miles in length, perched as it were on a mountain top. Whence can such a lake draw its supplies? What mountainsides can it drain when it is so high itself? The answer is, of course, that the snow-clad Andes have peaks so much higher than Titicaca, some of them towering ten thousand feet higher, that they afford plenty of rivers and rivulets to fill its basin.

An excursion to Lake Titicaca is not often undertaken! The approach to this mountain-top inland sea is a most interesting journey, and to the timid traveler not without its terrors.

One disembarks on the west coast of South America at Mollendo, in Peru, which shares with Antofagasta in Chile the unenviable distinction of being one of the two worst ports in the known world. Even on a calm day the swells seem frightful to a landsman, as he steps off the ship’s ladder, or is lowered in a bucket by a derrick from the ship’s deck into a small boat.

Up, up, up, to the skies the little boat seems to rise on every great billow, and then down, down, down to altitude of nearly fifteen thousand feet above the sea, before it can discharge its passengers on the shores of Lake Titicaca.

There is one oasis on this journey, made the more delightful by the mountainous desert which comes before it. At the end of the first long lap, one reaches Arequipa, 8,000 feet above the sea, situated on a well-watered valley where tropical fruits and flowers abound, but where the air is cooled and rarefied by the altitude. Over the city towers Mount Misti, 20,000 feet high, with an everlasting crown of snow upon its head. Here, too, in Arequipa, Harvard University has an observatory for photographing the stars of the Southern Hemisphere. The courteous manager of the observatory showed me a photographic plate on which the stars had taken their own pictures the night before. How many do you think there were in that one picture? You could never guess. There were 400,000, and he told me it would take two thousand plates of that size to photograph the whole Southern heavens. “What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?”

THE second day of the journey, like the boy of the banner with the strange device, we “keep getting upper,” until the railway finds a gap in the great hills, 14,500 feet above the sea, and wriggles its way through. The scenery everywhere is imposingly grand to the last degree, for stern and awful peaks are ever in view. Gentle llamas we see trudging along the few mountain trails; great flocks of sheep feed on the scanty herbage; here alpacas thrive; occasionally a graceful vicuña gazes solemnly from his cliff at the approaching train.

Many of our fellow passengers are afflicted with mountain sickness, and, from the noisy upheavals, one might imagine he was on a small ship in a gale.

From the height of the pass the train slides down a little matter of 2,000 feet until it comes to the shores of this sea among the mountains, which rejoices in the mellifluous name of Titicaca. Here are my impressions of this lake, written on the spot:

“In many respects this is the most wonderful lake in the world. Think of Lake Geneva increased many times in size, until it is as large as all the Swiss lakes put together, raised nearly two miles and a half in the air, and surrounded by peaks half as high again as Mt. Blanc, and one has some idea of this enormous reservoir on the Andes.

“This great lake, though it received the water of twenty rivers, has but one outlet, the sluggish Desaguado river, through which part of its waters flow into Lake Poopo, another very large body of water that lies at a somewhat lower level. But where do the waters then go? No one can tell, for Poopo has apparently no outlet. Probably an underground river carries off the surplus waters of both lakes into the Pacific, 300 miles away. Titicaca is 120 miles in length, but it takes the slow little steamer a night and half a day to make the journey to the farther end.

“In the middle of the lake we pass the famous Titicaca island where, according to tradition, the great god of the Incas, the first emperor was born. Here are still the remains of an enormous temple in his honor. The lake is in the midst of an enormous plain, much of it well cultivated, and in some places one can see the marvelous terraces of the ancient Incas well up on the mountainside, testifying to the industry and skill of this remarkable race.

“From this plain 700 years ago the very nadir it sinks. But the sturdy Peruvian boatmen never lose control, and carry us over the watery mountains and through the watery depths until at last they bring us to a slippery rock on which we step ashore with enforced agility. There is no harbor, only an open roadstead for Mollendo—indeed the whole west coast of South America is singularly barren of good harbors, only two or three decent ones in the whole great stretch of coast, for four thousand miles.

When we get ashore our troubles are only just begun, for a rickety, narrow-gauge railroad has great trouble often in avoiding the moving sandhills (a peculiarity of this coast, which are as irresistible as King Canute’s tides, and which often get in the little railroad’s way. Avoiding them, it puffs and snorts and wriggles its way up the sides of the Andes to an

The Comfort-Bringer

CHAPTER I

WHEN Ruth Carfax was a little girl she had, as she remembered, everything pertaining to people of wealth, but she had no home. There was much traveling in luxurious conveyances by land and water, and there were many big, crowded hotels, and many servants to wait upon her. There were governesses who taught her their own native tongues, and mixed her very sadly regarding her own; there were instructors in music—a heart-breaking science she found it! There was a pretty young mother and a gay young father—so gay that the servants whispered, indulgently, that he “had taken a little too much.”

Of course there were good times—parties, and pretty frocks, and best of all, Nancy, her English nurse, who told her lovely stories of the cottage in England, where the hawthorn bloomed in May, and the hedges were “a fair sight with wild roses and violets.” Ruth longed for the time when she might have a cottage and a hedge where wild roses bloomed—and “violets.”

When she was ten years old a terrible tragedy occurred: The ship on which her family were sailing, went down in mid-ocean, all—father, mother and English Nancy—went down in a common grave, leaving her alone in the world except for Grandfather Carfax.

Grandfather Carfax lived alone with his old servant Ned, who “did for him,” in a great, dark house in a great, dark city. That is, the part of it in which the old house was placed was very, very dark and dingy and old, and altogether unlovely.

GRANDFATHER CARFAX and old Ned, however, made up for everything else. If ever a ten-year-old child had a perfectly charming grandfather, Ruth was that lucky child, and if ever there was an altogether perfect man-of-all-work, old Ned was that person. One forgot all about the house in thrilling stories of the Civil War, in which Grandfather Carfax had been an officer and Ned his orderly. And, when she sat on Grandfather's lap, in the big old leather chair in the library, listening to tales of the little house up the country where he and grandmother had “set up housekeeping” when they were first married, and how she baked such good cakes and such sweet-smelling doughnuts, and loved to divide with the neighbors, and kept everything like a new pin, without a servant at all, Ruth fairly squirmed with delight.

“And when I'm big, let's us go back and set up housekeeping again, Grandfather—you, and me and Ned,” she would say, joyously, “and I'll keep it like a new pin, and make cakes, and divide with the neighbors, and do for you all your days.”

“Little Heart's-comfort,” Grandfather would say, tenderly, “there is nothing in the world I'd like better! But you'll have to learn to bake, and cook, and sew, so that you can do for me, you know. And you'll be obliged to go to school to learn to do all these beautiful things rightly.”

“I'll like to,” said Ruth, “and not have to study old languages any more—nor a single bit of music. And dancing's sort of silly, don't you think?”

Grandfather did; but he also thought education a very necessary thing, and Ruth went to school in the big, dark city, and came home in the evenings and told Grandfather and Ned and Mrs. Shipp, who had been added to their household, all about what she had learned that day.

Mrs. Shipp was a lady who had been, she told Ruth, “twice widowed,” and so had suffered much, but she was very capable and good, taking great care of them all, and most of all taking care of Ned, who was very fond of telling over his old stories to her, finding her a charming listener. Indeed when Ruth had finished High School Mrs. Shipp and Ned were married. Grandfather called them a couple of old silies, but they were very happy, in their sedate fashion, and stayed on in the big old house, taking care of Grandfather and Ruth, till she went to college, where she learned among other things, how to sew, and to cook, and to do all sorts of wonderful things with her hands as well as her brains—in short, she took a most excellent course in Home Economics.

During vacations they had planned, Ruth and Grandfather Carfax, all the wonderful things they could do when her education was completed, and they would go to live again in the little cottage up the country, where, the old man said, he would grow young and strong again, with his little Heart's-comfort to “do for” him.

But when Ruth was twenty, and had finished her last year at college, Grandfather Carfax quietly passed away in his great, tall-posted bed in the dark, old house in the city, and Ruth was left without kith or kin in all the world.

OLD Mr. Gary, Grandfather's lawyer, was very kind to her; Ruth had always likened him to Santa Claus, in her mind, because of

The little deep porch, where roses would twine beautifully, already had two old, comfortable benches to rest upon. A brown, weathered old house, cozy and homelike his long, wavy white hair and his marvelous, wavy white beard, as well as for a merry twinkle in his frosty old blue eyes, that somehow had a way of peering over his heavy-rimmed spectacles in a way singularly like Santa, in his most authentic portraits.

“What will you want to do now, Ruthie?” he asked gently, as they sat alone in the big, dark library, Ruth in Grandfather's chair, and old Sporty, the big white cat that he loved, purring contentedly on her lap. “Better give up the idea of living in the country, eh?”

“No, indeed, Mr. Gary,” replied Ruth, emphatically. “I'm going to live in our little house, just as he wished, and carry out all his plans; that is,” she added, hesitating, “if I have enough money to carry them out. If not, I'll just do the best I can.”

“There'll be a bit of money,” nodded Mr. Gary, “enough to live on very simply, you know.”

“My education cost a lot,” sighed Ruth, stroking Sporty, who purred loudly and happily, forgetting, after the manner of his kind, the old hand in the comfort of the new one.

“Yes; and your grandfather was pleased to spend his money that way, child, for he knew you'd be a credit to him. But, now that you are alone, maybe the city—”

“I hate it,” declared Ruth. “I—I want a cottage, and wild roses and—and ‘violets,’ as poor Nancy used to call them. And there'll be neighbors, Grandfather said they were good folks, all of them. Here I would have to do some work in an office or a store, to earn my living, and there I can raise chickens, and make a garden, and have a cow, and—and—”

“SOMEBODY to live with you, or I object,” put in Mr. Gary, sharply. “Ned and Mrs. Ned will stay on here—your grandfather provided for the faithful old fellow, leaving him the house to care for; he can fill it with lodgers, and make a good living that way. He had planned all that, I believe, with you.”

“Yes; I want poor old Ned and Mrs. Shipp”—for so they still called the lady, no longer widowed—“to stay on here and be comfortable always. And I'll get that stanch New England damsel right a ‘help’—the kind who is always one of the family, you know.”

“And we'll buy the furniture and have it shipped before we go,” said Mr. Gary, “or would you rather take some of the furnishings of this house, instead?”

“I want everything new as new,” declared Ruth, emphatically. “I wouldn't disturb anything in this old house, even if I wanted it, for Ned and Mrs. Shipp must feel at home, and they wouldn't if the rooms were dismantled, poor souls.”

“Yes, they will miss your grandfather and you; miss you both sadly,” nodded Mr. Gary, in assent.

“Grandfather and I had planned it all,” said Ruth; “we were to have the rooms gay as springtime, with bright chintz, and painted furniture, and fresh walls. Then there was the dearest kitchen and laundry, and bathroom—but will I have enough money to do all these things, Mr. Gary?”

“If you are saving, yes,” decided Mr. Gary, thoughtfully stroking his beard, “and there's a good market near for your farm products. You'll find the farm in good condition, for you know your grandfather has an old Scotchman living on it—a fierce old fellow, named Donaldson; he lives in the little tenant house on the place, and has, I believe, made a fair living from the land. I've no doubt he will be willing to stay on.”

“I want my own farm,” said Ruth, positively. “I'll hire Donaldson gladly, but I want to be a farmer, and plant hedges, hawthorn hedges, and have orchards, with plenty of fruit to can, and to give the neighbors' children. I do hope the neighbors will have children to visit me, Mr. Gary!”

“More than likely—poor folks always have oodles of 'em,” agreed Mr. Gary, pessimistically; being an old bachelor, he cared but little for children, in spite of his Santa Claus appearance.

RUTH and Mrs. Shipp went shopping next day to buy the furniture for the little house. Ruth had all the dimensions of the chambers, she knew exactly which one would be hers, which would be the guest-room—that, alas, would have been her grandfather's! Mr. Gary had supplied her with ample funds for the purpose, and she determined to get her money's worth, for Ruth was a canny bargainer and loved dearly to shop.

“The only thing I hate about it all,” sighed Mrs. Shipp, otherwise Mrs. Ned, “is that there ain't a handsome young man to go along and help you, dearie; this really ought to be a honeymoon like, with all this new, rosebuddy stuff, and brass and china. I hate to think of you, a lone woman, in the house all by your lonesome self, hangin' curtains, and such, and not a male to offer help.”

Ruth laughingly protested that she wasn't at all ready to think about husbands—there'd be plenty of time for that.

“Then don't you go and take a farmer,” warned Mrs. Shipp, earnestly; “for my first was a farmer, and dear knows the toil I went through with milking at daylight, and summer boarders to feed, and fowls to pluck for market. My second was a storekeeper, and I had time to breathe, till he was taken off sudden with apoplexy, account of too much pork and too little exercise, the doctor said. Don't you eat too free of pork, Miss Ruth, dearie; it's a heavy food.”

“I won't; and I'll take plenty of exercise, Mrs. Shipp,” said Ruth, solemnly, though her eyes twinkled. “You see, I'll have so much to do in my own home. Just think, it will be the first real home I've ever had; for dear Grandfather gave me the deeds to the little farm when I finished high school.”

"And if you can't get along with them country girls, just write and let me know, and Ned and I'll come on the next train," vowed Mrs. Shipp, and Ned, big, gouty old Ned, who could do little now because of his age and his feet, which had "gone back on him," echoed the promise. They would follow Miss Ruth to world's end, if so be she wanted them!

There were tears in Ruth's eyes when she parted from the faithful old people; Ned holding Sporty, the white cat, for Ruth had determined she would take nothing from the old house, not even her grandfather's pet, which should stay to comfort old Ned, as well as he could, for the master's loss.

CHAPTER II

THE little farm lay among the hills of the northern part of the state, and the journey, for most part, was very wearisome. Ruth was very glad when she and Mr. Gary alighted at the little station which was the end of their travel by train, and just two miles from the farm.

"There's old man Green, who was to meet us," said Mr. Gary, nodding toward an elderly man who sat in a wagon, behind a horse apparently as elderly as the driver.

"Hack?" queried the elderly one, briskly alighting. "I'm Abner Green, him you telephoned to," nodding to Mr. Gary. "It's a mighty expensive thing, them long-distance calls—ought to writ me a letter and saved money. And this is little Ruth, old man Carfax's boy Will's little girl? Well, well—grewed up, too. Mother must see ye," he smiled, taking Ruth's extended hand and patting it softly, "yes—Mother'll be glad to see any of the Carfax blood, for your grandma, forty year ago, nursed our boy through a spell o' measles, and Mother ain't one to forget."

"I'll be so glad to see her, as well as any of the neighbors who will come to see me," smiled Ruth, her eyes dim with tears—she had heard Grandfather Carfax speak so often of Abner Green, and of the baby Grandmother had nursed—she was glad they were still alive.

Mr. Gary and Ruth climbed into the wagon. Mr. Green flourished a whip over the old horse, called out "gid-dap!" in a very sharp and imperative tone, and they were on their way.

"Gran'ther leave ye purty well provided fer?" queried Mr. Green of Ruth, who shared his seat, "or jest the farm?"

"The farm, and a little money—enough to keep it up, Mr. Gary tells me," replied Ruth, sensing that the old man spoke kindly, and not from sheer curiosity.

"City folks don't always succeed," he nodded, knowingly. "Old man was powerful neighborly, he and your grandma, when they lived among us. Child, if you take after them you'll be a blessing to this community, so you will! And we all thought maybe he had made a fortune, in all these years. But the farm's pretty well tended. Old chap out there don't neighbor with us none, but he's a good farmer, and makes the land turn out crops better'n ordinary. And, if you fail, there's always school teachin'. Miss Em'ly, she's kinder laid up, these last few years, come winter. Rheumatiz. I'd hate to see Miss Em'ly go, but it's a chance she will—and then you apply. Here's your farm we're comin' to."

A ROW of magnificent elms ran parallel to the road; behind them Ruth could see nothing, though she peered.

"Gran'ther planted 'em," stated Mr. Green, "little saplin's when he was here. Your grandma, she allowed she'd call the place 'Hideaway House' when the ellums grewed big enough."

"Oh, that will just suit it! Look, Mr. Gary, my house is right behind them—did you ever see such trees?"

"Wonderful!" admired Mr. Gary, as they drew up to the row of trees and alighted, "and Hideaway House will be a fitting name, indeed. Here's the gate. Now will we find the furniture inside the house, Mr. Green?"

"Yep, all hauled out and stored away safe," nodded the driver, "though that old Scotchman eyed me mighty suspicious like, as if he was afeared I'd make away with somethin'. I told him, just like you said, that nothin' was to be arranged till the young lady got here. And them plumber fellers you sent air in the village, at Si Horner's tavern; likewise the painters and paperhangers. Blest if I know what you aim to have done. And it's powerful expensive, too."

"Oh, but think, Mr. Green," said Ruth, coaxingly, "if you've never, never had a real home, how beautiful it will be to have one at last, just as you want it."

"Somethin' in that, too," allowed Mr. Green, and smiled upon this city girl in a very affectionate manner—a fatherly manner, indeed.

Now they had entered the gate and were in the little yard that was hoary with aged shrubs and long grass, but in which Ruth's eyes saw boundless possibilities. It was a little, friendly house whose closed windows would twinkle a welcome, when they were opened wide, whose heavy oaken door with its leaded fanlight looked a friendly door, not one to shut against the world—not a selfish door. The little deep porch, with pillars where roses would twine beautifully, already had two old, comfortable benches for the folk who came to rest upon. A brown, weathered old house, cozy and homelike. Ruth's heart thrilled when she put her key in the lock and turned it.

"Enter, my neighbors, and be welcome!" she laughed, though tears were hanging from her lashes,

"I suppose there is a stove in the kitchen, and we can put it up and cook a dandy lunch in no time."

"Got abundance o' groceries in the pantry, and I took the liberty to set up the stove myself," said Mr. Green, "thinkin' ye might happen to be hungry."

THE hall was dim, and the rooms were crowded with furniture downstairs; upstairs Ruth did not explore. Mr. Gary went out to look up Donaldson, and Ruth and Mr. Green, who insisted upon helping, soon had a fire going in the new stove in her kitchen. Then, while the old man looked curiously on, the city girl set about preparing a meal that opened his eyes regarding her ability.

In a very few minutes she had the repast ready, it seemed to him, though he was quite sure the stove hadn't had time to get "het up" properly. When Mr. Gary appeared with a shaggy-haired, sour-faced man accompanying him the meal was on the table.

"This is Mr. Donaldson, Ruth," said Mr. Gary, cheerfully, "and I have persuaded him to stay on your farm as manager. He seems to have made a success of it; wonderful orchards and gardens back of the house."

Donaldson, coldly casting a glance upon Mr. Green, surveyed the girl who had come to take possession of her farm with something akin to hostility; evidently he had not cared about turning it over to her.

Ruth smiled and held out her hand in friendly greeting, her eyes filled with friendly light.

They were nice eyes—very. Blue, and candid and clear as a June sky, with faith and loyalty and love for humanity shining in their depths. Ruth was not beautiful, but she was wholesomely handsome, with her clear, fresh skin, her shapely, athletic body and her graceful head bearing a wealth of shining, russet hair. Youth was hers, health and a kind heart—could one want more than these?

"I am glad you are to stay, Mr. Donaldson," she said, and the Scotchman took her outstretched hand in a limp grasp, murmuring that he, "would do his endeavors to suit her." Ruth could not say, as yet, that she felt any liking for Donaldson.

"Sit down, Mr. Donaldson, and have a bit of lunch with us," invited Ruth, cordially, "there's only a packing-case for a table, and no cloth, but there's plenty to eat, of its kind, and chairs enough to sit in. Dishes are not so plentiful, till I unpack; but there are paper trays and napkins I sent down for this very meal. Sit down, gentlemen!"

THEY sat; even Donaldson sat with them, and watched the lady of the cottage as she moved from stove to table with the hot food, and graciously served her guests. Ruth had made perfect coffee.

When No One Smiles Back

I LEFT the office yesterday feeling as though I had come into a large and splendid inheritance. I was so happy that I wanted to laugh aloud, and to sing. The work that I had planned to do had gone quickly and easily, a certain favorite story of mine had not been returned, and I had received many pleasant letters from many pleasant people. Indeed, as our doughboys used to say, I was "sitting on the world!"

I left the office, smiling to myself over a good day that I had just added to the procession of the past. And on the street outside the office I met the Nicest Man, who was waiting for me. And we got into the subway train together—for we had a far-away dinner engagement—and started upon a long and crowded ride. And just once I patted the sleeve of the Nicest Man's coat—just once! Because I was happy, and my work had gone well, and the day had been a good one. And as I patted it I heard a voice from across the aisle speak sharply. And I heard another voice answer it.

"It seems," said the first voice, "that the women are doing the love-making this year."

And the second voice said—

"Yes, indeed! And in the subway, too!"

I looked furtively across the aisle. And I saw two severe ladies staring at me. And, though I had a perfect right to pat the Nicest Man's sleeve, I felt suddenly guilty. And I folded my hands in my lap, and erased the smile from my face. And I sat quietly and silently in my place. And as I sat there I could feel the eyes of the two severe women upon me, weighing, judging, criticizing. When they finally left the subway train and I was released from the weight of disapproval I could not help feeling that some of the joy of living had been drained from my soul and I knew that my heart was not beating quite so gaily.

THE subway car was crowded, as it usually is, with weary people. As I looked down the length of it I realized, suddenly, that I, too, was tired. Perhaps I realized that I was tired, because so many faces were dark—because so many people looked peevish and out of sorts. A woman laden with bundles spoke crossly to the tiny girl who sat beside her; a prosperous-looking business man, apparently on his way home, reprimanded a small messenger boy who inadvertently tripped over his outstretched legs.

What a Cloud It Casts Over the Day If One Sees Only Frowns

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"Look where you're going!" he snarled. "Can't you see where you're putting your feet?"

The little messenger boy wanted to answer back. I could tell it from his small, sullen face. It was not good temper on his part that made him refrain from answering; it was the size of the business man, who was far larger than the average!

Up and down the car I looked. And, as I looked, I realized poignantly that I was no longer "sitting on the world"—that my head was no longer in the clouds. Once or twice I essayed a timid smile—but the smile was not answered. Indeed, the folk that I smiled at regarded me with raised, questioning eyebrows. And I could almost—in imagination—hear them say:

"I wonder who she's looking at, anyway! I wonder if it's possible that she's daring to smile at me!" I sighed, very softly, to myself. But the Nicest Man heard the sigh.

"What's the matter?" he questioned. "You were ever so happy just a moment ago! I thought when you met me, that you were out-pollyannaing Pollyanna! Has anything happened?"

With my hands tight folded in my lap I answered. And perhaps my answer was just a shade cynical.

"It's lonesome business," I told him, "being the only happy person in a subway train!"

The Nicest Man laughed—as he almost always laughs—understandingly.

"Then," he said, "let's go! For here's our station." And together we left the subway and went up to the street, and to the pale sunlight of the dying day.

PEOPLE don't always realize what an effect their expressions may have on the folk who pass them by upon the street, who rub elbows with them in the market place. They don't realize how much their chance words of disapproval may mean, how deep their frowns may go, how terribly their pessimism may hurt. They don't realize that a bit of uncontrolled anger may leave a lasting impression upon some just-forming child mind—and upon the mind of some disinterested observer who may be a grown-up!

I once knew a singer who was the leading soprano in a large city church—a woman with a splendid voice and a beautiful personality. She was a very kind and gentle woman herself, one who never spoke in anger, or found fault, or looked at people unkindly. And she was a great favorite—every one came to her for advice and encouragement.

"Perhaps you've noticed," she said once, "that my voice is better on some days than it is on other days. Perhaps you've noticed some times that the tone of it is full and sweet and at other times that it is heavy and dull! Perhaps you've noticed that, but I doubt if you could guess the reason for it!"

"When I stand up in my place to sing, the faces of my audience make a great impression upon me. If they're friendly, smiling, glad, I feel that I really want to give them my best, and I feel more able to give them my best! Their smiles are like a tonic to me; their happy eyes are like a message of love."

"If they're friendly it helps—oh, immeasurably! But if they look at me with hard, super-critical eyes I feel all choked-up inside. I feel stifled! If they look as if they had angry emotions in their hearts, if they look fretful, or impatient, or dissatisfied, my voice seems to dry up. And I sing badly. I can't help it!"

That is the effect of unsmiling faces upon a great singer. Perhaps unsmiling faces—and cross expressions—have the same effect on other famous people, too.

I can imagine a judge making an unfavorable decision because everyone near him had seemed out of sorts for a couple of hours. I can imagine an editor missing the point of a good story because his office force had been taciturn and glum. I can imagine a writer failing to put inspiration into a poem because of a lack of sympathetic understanding in the crowds about him. And I can imagine many other situations along the same line of reasoning.

Friends of mine, don't carry unsmiling faces with you! For, by doing so, you may be the ones to keep something worth while from the world. The effect that you have upon your friends—and even upon perfect strangers—may be a profound and lasting one!

Smile, instead, and be cheerful. And, perhaps, then you will be the one to give—quite indirectly—some great gift to your fellow men!

Mr. Harding's First Message

PRESIDENT HARDING, after a month of rumor coupled with skilful political maneuvering on the part of Republican leaders in Washington, has enunciated his foreign and domestic policy. This first official expression of the new administration, in the form of a personally delivered message to Congress now meeting in extra session, is frankly intended to be a liquidation of last fall's campaign promises and so far as the daily press is concerned, was received with sentiments controlled by political alignments.

Read without bias, there is much to commend in it. Conversely, there is much to criticize.

Certainly, there will be agreement with Mr. Harding in his demand that we "restrict our national expenditures within the limit of our national income and at the same time measurably lift the burdens of war taxation from the shoulders of the American people." His plan is twofold: "Rigid resistance in appropriation" and "the utmost economy in administration." He commits himself unreservedly to reorganization of government departments and the quick passage of the federal budget bill and he strongly insists on a fulfillment of the Republican pre-election pledge of internal tax revisions and a readjustment of the tariff.

The welfare of American agriculture, he believes, depends in part on proper protection by tariff and in part on a lowering of the high cost of transportation. In regard to the railways, he insists on an immediate reduction in freight rates and cost of operation in which both capital and labor shall share alike. "Labor," he says, "must join management in understanding that the public which pays is the public to be served."

The settlement of transportation problems also involves consideration of highway development and expansion, however, and the message contains strong representations for federal aid in road building, coupled with strict checks on all construction projects.

On these points, except for the aged problem of tariff, there can be little disagreement. The country wants a lightening of the direct tax burden; it wants a reduction in the cost of living; it wants economy in government; in brief, to use a familiar Harding expression, it wants a return to normalcy.

There will not be, however, such agreement on those parts of the message devoted to foreign relations. These, in brief, urge: First, abandonment of the present League of Nations covenant; second, passage by Congress of a declaratory resolution establishing peace with the Central Powers; third, the development of an association of nations without "supergovernment" authority; fourth, an assurance of our sympathetic co-operation with Europe in the settlement of Europe's economic problems; fifth, a pledge of co-operation with other nations in a movement for disarmament, but no disarmament on the part of the United States alone.

Failure of the League of Nations as at present constituted was foreknown. The other references to the foreign policy were perhaps milder than might have been expected. The regrettable thing about the pronouncement, however, is the complete absence of program or constructive suggestion. Mr. Harding states his policy, but neglects to provide in a single instance a method by which the policy will be worked out. Of only one thing can we be sure—a continued isolation from world affairs tempered by what may conceivably develop into a new Hague convention based on a revision or new interpretation of international law.

Signs of the Times

EVIDENCE seems to be accumulating that the moral and spiritual changes wrought by the great war have not by any means been confined to the Protestant bodies. The Russian Church, as is now known, has probably suffered more than the others in general disorganization, and loss of prestige and authority. We read of widespread losses in the Jewish synagogues in Europe, although the cable statements are still somewhat indefinite. The New York Herald's special correspondent in Paris, on April 9, reported that "more than a million Bohemians have separated themselves from the mother body since Europe's map was changed and are now members of the new state church of Czechoslovakia."

These are signs of the times which thoughtful readers will hardly regard with surprise. In our own land, there is need of a deep heart-searching by all the churches, a realization of the importance of living closer to God, and a ready and willing recognition of the duty of leading the people God-ward—in a word, of doing the whole duty of Christian shepherds rather than of multiplying their activities and dividing their energies in affairs not within their proper sphere. "Seek ye first the Kingdom," said the Master, "and all things needful will be added unto you."

The Protestant Churches in the United States will progress in proportion as they do their legitimate spiritual duty—spreading the Gospel of Jesus Christ at home and abroad, closing up the breaches of division, and uniting in the effort to reach the common people, remembering that it was recorded of Jesus, the Founder of the Church, that "the common people heard Him gladly."

The world-wide conditions to which we have referred should lead us to consider conditions at home. After years of severe mental and physical strain, there are signs that as a people we are gradually regaining normal conditions. The long period of upheaval and unrest, of uncertainty and deprivation, has passed and the reaction comes with unexpected force. We find that we have gained much and lost much—that our morale as a nation needs reinforcement. The serious tasks that call us are apt to be pushed aside; yet never have we needed more to be well poised than now.

To counteract these conditions is the task which the Church must now face. There must be a time of spiritual stock-taking. With all the churches united in such an effort, and strengthened by the prayers of God's people, we may confidently hope to witness that spiritual restoration which is the nation's greatest need.

Hidden Music

WE SPEAK of the harmonies of nature and we read of the morning stars having sung together, but such phrases, beautiful and picturesque as they are, are generally valued chiefly as a poetical form of expression. Science, however, is acting as interpreter. Certain birds, naturalists tell us, have well-defined musical themes, and their trills and cadences can be represented on the staff like other tunes. If these have their songs, why not other birds also, although the human ear may catch but a few? John Burroughs was a great lover of bird-song. With few exceptions, however, he found that each songster had but a limited number of phrases or passages; whether they were songs of joy or signals to their mates, he could not learn.

In a most interesting article in the Atlantic Monthly, Alida Chanler discusses the "Unexplored Harmonies" of nature. She tells of a Mexican bird of the thrush family whose throat "fairly quivered with notes inaudible to my ears . . . its small body vibrates to notes we can not catch at all. And if this is true of sound, it is even more true of light." Science, she tells us, has lately found a new kind of periscope to turn the corner from light to sound. It is called the "oscillating audion" wireless receiver, and it opens up to the human ear sounds that until now have been wholly inaudible—"as sweet as flutes, as variable as Hawaiian guitars." These ether-vibrations are too high pitched for the unaided ear to detect, but the audion makes them clearly distinguishable. By means of this rarely sensitive contrivance, which may be connected with the telephone, the listener is enabled to hear a thousand unimagined musical surprises in nature. It reveals in its sound vibrations a score of octaves! Such a range, unattainable by voice or instrument, no musician could ever have dreamed of. Yet when we consider that by means of the radio, a conversation between Europe and America can be "listened in" upon by Japan, we cease to marvel at the possibilities of the voices of nature becoming audible. This wonderful instrument is described as being capable of being toned or so adjusted as to bring melody out of what may with less care and intention seem to be but absolute confusion. This reminds us of the description in Greek mythology of the Chamber of Harmonious Sounds, hung midway between heaven and earth and which caught all the sounds of the world and sent them aloft in musical concord.

With the development of the new contrivance which science has provided, we may expect that the sounds of nature will become more clearly translatable—the soft and low cadences of the summer wind, no less than the music of Niagara; the song of the brook or the murmuring sounds of a great city heard at a distance like the waves of a soft-toned orchestra. Miss Chanler seems to picture just such an enjoyment to be derived from this new device. "If we are patient," she writes, "we may yet hear the morning stars singing together, or catch a whisper of moonbeams filtering down."

The Glorious Assurance

"IF a man die, shall he live again?" is asked by Job in what is believed to be the oldest book of the Scriptures. And the same question, in many forms and with infinite variations, has been discussed by philosophers and speculative thinkers since the beginnings of history. In Egypt and Greece and among the Hebrews long before the Christian era, we find immortality canvassed as a hope rather than as a thing assured. We find traces of the same belief in China, Persia, and even among the American Indians, Polynesians, Australian aborigines and Greenlanders.

But the great revelation came with Christ, who "brought life and immortality to light." Jesus lifted the veil. He transformed the hope of the world into assurance. The dim foreshadowing was dissolved, and in its place came the great conviction which lifted desire to sublime confidence. Today the Church of Christ teaches immortality to all its followers, and urges the duty of striving to "win the prize," that they may begin to live eternally here and now, confident in the realization of God's pardon and acceptance, promised through His Son. These are set forth in the Gospels so clearly that none may misunderstand.

We are no longer living in the age of darkened minds. It is therefore all the more surprising to find that the message given from some pulpits, far from being either enlightening or direct, is diffident and halting on this vital issue. This should not be so. We should seriously question the qualifications of anyone as a minister of the Gospel who does not lay stress on forgiveness, acceptance and immortality. The light has come into the world; but there are many who still love the darkness, and who prefer confusing controversy to that clear illumination which is furnished in the Gospel.

At this season of the year, when all nature is budding forth into renewal of life, we are reminded of the "eternal spring" which comes into the hearts of those who find forgiveness and the assurance of the life hereafter. Having this message in the Gospel, it is our privilege to hold fast to it as the ultimate revelation from the highest Authority. Why should any Christian who believes in Jesus Christ, and who has entered His service and received the full and free gift of divine forgiveness, doubt concerning the one crowning fact which is the summit of all the aspirations of faith among the race of men? For it is His desire that "none should perish, but should have everlasting life." No Christian need ever dread the thought of the hereafter who has this assurance.

Mont-Lawn in Springtime

THE Christian Herald Children's Home at Mont-Lawn has been called "one of the miracles of the blessing that rests on benevolence." Founded in 1894, it was the direct outcome of a work of charity which had been conducted by the readers of the Christian Herald during the preceding severe winter. Our readers responded to an appeal in behalf of the hundreds of thousands of unemployed, and their gifts were the means of providing food and fuel for several thousand families in the tenements of New York, who were facing very serious hardships. Many churches aided in this enterprise, and eighteen of them gave up their basements or other available rooms which were used as distribution depots during the long, hard winter.

This experience gave Dr. Klopseh a personal knowledge of conditions in the homes of the poor. In the following spring he planned to take a number of children from those homes which had been helped during the winter, and give them a summer outing. The Mont-Lawn property was rented at a merely nominal figure and a few years after the opening, the place was purchased. From that time on Mont-Lawn has continued to grow. Every season has brought new patrons to the Home. The work begun in such simple fashion and on a limited scale, has now become, under God's blessing and through the generous co-operation of friends in every state, one of the best of its kind in the whole land.

Childhood's impressions are lasting. A kindness done to some little one is recalled with a glow of gratitude long afterward. No investment ever yielded such rich returns as this, in sweet and kindly memories.

We trust to have the aid of all our patrons in making the coming summer at Mont-Lawn the happiest and most successful of all. Share your blessing with others by inviting your acquaintances to follow your example in giving a summer outing to some poor little son or daughter of poverty.

Debate on World War Problems Delayed as Congress Begins Work

WITH President Harding having recommended enough legislation to keep Congress working at high speed for several months, the extraordinary session of Congress has begun with the Republicans in full control in both Houses by majorities so large as to be almost embarrassing to the leaders.

The first day was devoted to routine matters and the introduction of a great number of bills, the sessions being very brief. The House organization was effected quickly, Representative Frederick H. Gillett of Massachusetts being reelected as Speaker by a vote of 298 to 122 for Representative Claude Kitchin. The second day was marked by the delivery in person of President Harding's message, which is discussed fully elsewhere in this issue, and on the third day the real work was started.

In the Senate, Senator Knox again offered his resolution declaring the war between the United States and the Central Powers at an end, modified to meet the views of the President and with a provision for preserving all the rights obtained by this country under the armistice and the Versailles Treaty. Debate then was begun on the question of ratifying the Colombian Treaty, which has been pending for several years, and the discussion of the international problems growing out of the World War was allowed to wait on a fuller definition of the Harding policy.

The House gave precedence to tariff legislation and after brief debate passed a bill which combines the Farmers' Emergency bill, vetoed by Mr. Wilson at the last session, with anti-dumping legislation and a section intended to overcome the difference of exchange.

Replies to Mandate Note Delayed

ACCEPTANCE by the Allied governments of the principles laid down in Secretary Hughes's note regarding mandates—a matter vital to the successful working out of the foreign policy on which the new administration is embarking—has been delayed, but the preliminary reply of France encouraged Washington officials to believe the Allies would concede the American contention that no final disposition of Germany's overseas possessions could be made without America's approval.

The French note stated that no reply to the Hughes communication could be sent except after agreement between the governments of the four interested Powers at the next meeting of the Allied Supreme Council, but expressed the desire of France "to find a solution which will give every satisfaction to the United States." The date for the next Supreme Council meeting has not been fixed, but it probably will be convened early in May because of the critical stage of the reparations controversy with Germany. Support for America's contention against the assignment of Yap to Japan was seen in the fact that France recalled declarations in a note of February 18, never made public, that President Wilson and Mr. Lansing had "formulated in the presence of the representative of Japan, categorical reservations on the subject of the island of Yap, that Baron Makino did not refuse to allow the question raised by the United States to be brought under discussion, and that in consequence the Japanese Government had cognizance of the American reservations." Japan has been loath to admit that such a reservation was made.

Leading Japanese newspapers were urging that a conciliatory attitude should be assumed, although some opposed any concessions whatever, and the government was understood to be consulting Great Britain and France on the subject. Debate on mandates in the British Parliament was shut off by Premier Lloyd George with the statement that friendly discussion was in progress and that debate might do much harm. The Italian Government was understood to have returned a verbal reply that the question was one which does not concern Italy.

CELEBRATING 110 YEARS OF WOMEN'S MISSIONARY ACTIVITIES
Sixteen "females," as the church records termed them, assembled in the First Baptist Church of Philadelphia in 1810 and organized their first Women's Missionary Society. Recently a church pageant celebrated the event and some of the costumes of the original members were worn by their descendants who have carried on the work.

Germany to Offer New Terms

WITH the approach of May 1, when under the Versailles Treaty the Allies "have a rendezvous with Germany" on the reparations issue, the controversy between the Allies and Germany remains outwardly at quite as much of a deadlock as when the unsuccessful conference in London broke up so abruptly. Under the surface, however, there have been developments which tend to make each side more conciliatory and which give hopes of a solution.

One of these developments is the growing realization in Germany that the Allies are in deadly earnest and that they are allowing France to take the lead in determining what further penalties shall be imposed on Germany if she continues her attitude of defiance. The people of Germany have ceased to regard the Allied proposals for penalties with apathy, as was the case a month ago, and are frankly apprehensive; and this changed view has been manifest in the utterances of the Berlin officials, particularly those of Dr. Simons, the Foreign Minister, who has conducted the negotiations. The Germans were aware that France was making ready for further military action, while President Harding's declarations in his message to Congress had destroyed any hope that America might intervene to restrain the Allies. German experts were working out new reparations proposals, which it was suggested would be offered to the Allies through the mediation of some nation not now involved in the controversy.

In France there was a growing sentiment for moderation, despite Premier Briand's declaration in the Chamber of Deputies: "The time for words has passed. We must now revert to acts." French business and financial circles were beginning to doubt that measures of force furnished the best way of collecting from Germany and were inquiring what had been achieved by the recent extension of the occupied zone. They were ready to consider seriously a proposal for American mediation of the reparations dispute if Germany should suggest such a plan. This moderate position would have won many more adherents had it not been for the general distrust of Germany's good faith and for the anxiety over the reconstruction of the framework of Germany's military machine so as to make her potentially formidable.

Railroad Agreements Abrogated

ABROGATION of the national agreements defining working conditions on all the railroads formerly under federal control has been ordered by the Railway Labor Board, effective July 1, and the task of formulating new rules has been left to conferences between the employees and management of each line. This was regarded as a victory for the companies, as the unions have sought to have such questions settled by a single conference for the entire nation.

The Board's decision directs that conferences shall begin at the earliest possible date and that the Board shall be kept informed of progress. There was a warning to both parties in the reservation by the Board of the right to abrogate the agreements at a date earlier than July 1 with regard to any class of employees which may unduly delay the progress of negotiations and of the right to extend the agreements with regard to any railroad which may block a settlement.

Sixteen principles which are to serve as a foundation in the formulation of new rules were defined by the Board and in these the union leaders were gladdened by the concession of some rights for which they have been contending. This declaration emphasizes the obligation of both carriers and workers to render adequate service in an economical way and demands hearty co-operation; admits the right of the managements to enforce proper discipline, but holds that no employee should be disciplined without a fair hearing; recognizes the right of the employees to organize, and forbids discrimination between members and non-members of unions; accepts the principles of the eight-hour day and of seniority; and requires that the employees should be consulted prior to a decision adversely affecting their wages or working conditions.

The decision affects all classes of railway employees except those in the train service, for whom there are agreements between the "big four" brotherhoods and the separate railroads.

Former German Empress Dies

THE death in exile at Doorn of Augusta Victoria, the former German Empress, showed that the Hohenzollern family still has a strong grip on a considerable section of the German people. The Ebert government sent a message of condolence to the former Kaiser; in many parts of the country flags were half-masted and monarchists donned mourning; and arrangements were made for burial in a royal mausoleum at Potsdam, which originally was intended for the tomb of Frederick the Great. The funeral was to be the occasion for a great gathering of one-time royal and near-royal personages and of the men who dominated Germany in the pre-revolutionary days.

The former Empress, who was sixty-two years old, had suffered from chronic heart disease ever since the flight into Holland in 1918, and several times her children had been summoned in expectation of her death, but only the former Kaiser and Prince Adalbert were at the bedside when the end came. The husband's grief was extreme, for the former Empress had been a most devoted wife and mother, and their marriage in 1881 was a love match.

The Dutch government refused to permit the former Kaiser and the former Crown Prince to accompany the body to Potsdam, as that would make necessary a con-

The World's Need of Christ

A Sermon by REV. FERDINAND Q. BLANCHARD *

TEXT—Heb. 10 : 22. "Therefore let us hold fast the profession of our faith, without wavering."

SOME years ago, a famous American physician, then of Johns Hopkins and afterwards of Oxford, opened a notable lecture at Harvard University with a brilliant sketch intended to show how lacking is modern society in any deep concern for questions that are comprehended by the term "religion." Whether Dr. Osler drew a true picture or not, there are many who not only would agree with him but would declare that this is only what you might expect. "Of all the great interests of humanity, religion," they would say, "is the least interesting. Politics, art, sport, education—these are departments of life in which all men are concerned. But religion! It offers dull, unimportant themes."

A very common view is this, but a most strange one. What are the books that have most deeply stirred people? The majority of them have been stories with some issue of religion as their theme. What are the articles that provoke the keenest debate? Usually articles on religion. What are the meetings which call together the largest crowds? Can one suppose that if he had been speaking upon the methods of education, Billy Sunday would have been obliged to build special tabernacles to hold his audiences?

Of course, now and then, some passing issue may arouse the deepest feeling. But although other interests of life do this once and again at intervals, religion has the power to do it at any time. And why should it not? Is it conceivable that a matter with which is wrapped up the fundamental interests of life, which every man in his greatest moments finds supreme, and which holds the answer to the most piercing questions in humanity, can fail of interest till life itself fails to be interesting? When physical existence indeed is counted a negligible thing, men thrill to hopes and march to purposes which would be meaningless and futile save for the assertions of religion. So man's sober second thought invariably and emphatically reduces the comment that religion is uninteresting to a criticism more or less justified that some presentation of the great theme has been unworthy of it. Carlyle said long ago, "A man's religion is the chief fact in regard to him." Interest in the chief thing in life cannot be called in question.

Let us think for a while upon the part religion has played in life and its power to move men, as confirming our faith in its importance and inspiring us to lay hold for ourselves upon its power. And because our religious faith and interest is Christian, it is of the Christian religion that I would speak.

WHEN the faith of Jesus took root in the Roman Empire it was a very tiny, obscure thing. It came from a province held in disdain, save for the wealth that might be extracted from it, and there was not much of that. Its chief figure had suffered a slave's death. Its adherents were slaves and humble people. It had no program to strike the imagination; no appeal that caught the popular fancy. When Nero, to turn from himself the public censure that involved him with the burning of Rome, picked upon the Christians as his scapegoat, he counted it good policy to do so, because although they were already numerous enough to furnish sufficient victims for his purpose, they were held in such poor account as to awaken little pity.

And now note the miracle. Some thirty years later, another persecution of Christians occurred. This time they were not outcasts, but a formidable company, thought to be endangering the ancient foundations of the Empire. As the years passed the persecutions recurred, because the fear the Christians had inspired grew greater. But the persecutions proved futile. At last came the sudden, ever-memorable change. The despised faith of Galilee became an acknowledged religion of Rome. The Cross was lifted above the eagles.

Think of the meaning of all this. Not merely had the Christian religion won its way against paganism, but the question of religious faith had become the chief concern of the Empire. How? Christianity had acquired at this time no armies. Force had not been its means of success. What then had happened? Some one put it in this way: "The Christian out-lived the pagan and out-died him." Not his art nor his literature gave the Christian his fuller life; but his religion. What art and literature there were all sprang out of the religion. Gibbon and other historians recite the same story. Because of his religion the Christian had more and better morals, more hope, more power. An ancient writer of the times testified to the prevailing faith when he wrote that "the Holy Spirit was a glad spirit!"

It is a familiar fact that the Christians reduced all who knew them to amazement by the way they met death. The noble Roman, with his stoic philosophy, died bravely, but these transformed slaves of Caesar's household and women of the temple died triumphantly. Not every one, of course. Death, and death particularly in the shape of fire or wild beasts, was no more attractive then than now. Many escaped from one city to another, when it threatened. But ever and again, one stood up and laughed at the worst men could conceive, and the spirit of heroism played round him like a lambent flame. In the mob that yelled "The Christian to the lions," many a spectator bowed in shame and sought the secret of such a wonderful faith as had been revealed.

WHAT was the result? The old Roman world was overwhelmed. Its fortifications against the great hosts of northern peoples at last gave way. Everywhere the wealth of the Cæsars became the

"Lastly, and which was not least, a great hope and inward zeal they had of laying some good foundation, or at least to make some way thereunto, for ye propagating and advancing ye Gospel of ye Kingdom of Christ in those remote parts of the world."

BUT it may be said, "All this is true, yet of late religion has not been the moving impulse. The American Revolution, the Napoleonic war, the Civil conflict of '61, the great European struggle, these were not concerned with religion. The day when religion was supreme has passed." Suppose we grant this for a moment. Then we are driven to a conclusion which I am going to state in these words of one who was not an orthodox Christian, but who was a great thinker who did not miss the significance of religion:

"All our mighty achievements are being hampered and often neutralized. All our social diseases are being aggravated by this supreme and dominant fact that we have suffered our religion to slide from us. The urgent task of our time is to recover a religious faith as a basis of life, both personal and social."

And then our one hope is that which is suggested in the words of John Morley, "Religion is not that supreme, penetrating, controlling, decisive part of a man's life which it has been and will be again."

But it is not necessary to grant the case in just this way. Religion, for the past two hundred years, has not visibly and immediately swayed the course of history as it did for the preceding seventeen hundred. But the ultimate, supreme motive of life is still religion, the final incentive to heroism is still religion. The war in Europe produced uncounted heroic acts. There has been glory for many and it has been a joy to accord many all possible honors.

THE other day, a Southern mountaineer landed in New York acclaimed as the bravest of all. His courage seemed almost superhuman indeed, but I know a yet greater heroism and a sublimer courage which the war produced.

Five hundred miles beyond Constantinople in Asia Minor is the city of Sivas. Here lived in 1914 an American woman, a teacher of the practical arts and the lore of scholarship, administrator of school finances, nurse in the hospital, director of industries for the poor and destitute. In 1914, when the Turkish troops were dying by thousands from disease, she volunteered for the Red Cross service, and after a three week's journey through mud, in the valleys and snow on the mountains, took up her duties as head nurse at the Central Hospital. Four months later she returned to her home to find that the tide of unspeakable cruelty of Turk and Kurd had rolled over it. Human beings and animals lay dead along the roadside. Famine and plague stalked everywhere. But she had become a person of repute, and the governor was in her debt for her services to the soldiers. And as her guerdon of honor, what did she ask? The order for the deportation had gone forth. Her request was that she might go in company with the hopeless exiles. The plan was to drown the entire company of two thousand or as many as should still be alive when they reached a bridge crossing a river. But at that bridgehead stood this American woman, facing the human beasts that raged around her and the company of Armenians passed over safely.

And then she went back to Sivas, to famine and typhus, alone, for she would not have others share her daily peril; back to distribute supplies which came through, and do what one could in the hell that had been created. And the war passed. From three Governments honors have been bestowed upon her, but she has not returned to receive them in person. She stays there in desolated Asia Minor. She is operating a farm and two grist mills and sees to the planting of the fields, to support one thousand orphans. Where will you turn in all the glorious annals of the years past for a story of greater heroism, or for an equal to it of continuing courage? And if you should ask for the secret the answer would come straight and sure, "The love of Christ constraineth us."

Yes, today as yesterday, religion is the mightiest force in life!

The appeal of religion calls us to this knowledge and the service it inspires. It is not the Church which is at stake. That is only an instrument. It is not religion, itself, for that cannot be destroyed. But it is our life and the life of this generation in which we live. Therefore, oh, how overwhelming the logic, let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering!

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"How Firm a Foundation," or "Stand up, Stand up for Jesus."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 37 : Verses 1 to 11.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 325, first column.)

Sermon—"THE WORLD'S NEED OF CHRIST"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah," or "The Homeland, O the Homeland."

Benediction, by Pastor Sheldon, to be read aloud: Encompass us, O Thou who rememberest our flesh and knoweth that we are needy, with Thy protection, and enfold us with Thy defense from all terrors by day or night, and make us to feel Thy strength in our weakness and Thy peace in our confusion and Thy forgiveness in our sin, and reveal to us Thy glory that we may never want. For Jesus' sake and his power in us, we ask. AMEN.

spoil of those that had been called "barbarians." But one power withstood the flood. The same power that had become central in the old world now began to master the new. And the clue to all this history is religion.

Men have called the centuries which ensued upon the collapse of imperial power in Italy the "dark ages," because the culture which had developed about the Mediterranean was largely forgotten. Great hosts of strong, vigorous people, who knew nothing of Homer or Cicero or Virgil, were forming new nations. By and by beauty and literature and art were to come into their own again and receive new and priceless additions. But for a while war and politics occupied the energies not employed in mere existence. What was the saving element in the middle ages? Religion. Practically all that was preserved from what had made the old days good was preserved by religion. All the impulses bringing light into the chaos were bound up with religion. The fine instincts in life which were to create the new civilization were in the keeping of religion.

I have said first, that religion was the chief force in the old Roman Empire, and secondly, that it was the dominant force in the Middle Ages. How about its place in what we know as the third division of history since the birth of Christ, the modern world? There are various outstanding events that must instantly come to mind. There is the great cataclysm in Europe which shook every state to its center—the Reformation, a struggle over religion. Remember that in England's momentous days, when civil liberty was developing, her hero, Cromwell, and his invincible troopers were swayed by religion more than by love of country. Recall that the foundations of New England were laid by those who thus wrote of the motives which inspired them to hazard life, to conquer a wilderness:

The Heavenly City

SUNDAY. Heb. 11 : 10. "He looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God." A man can be in the land of promise, and yet not feel at home. "He so-journed in the land of promise as in a strange country." But why these feelings of the vagrant? Why this sense of homelessness in the promised land?

In the verse which precedes the text we are told that in the land of promise Abraham dwelt in tents, and the shifting tenure made the country appear perpetually strange. Tent-life gave him the consciousness of a changing and uncertain possession. He pitched his tent here today, and for a few short hours he tasted the delights of possession. But on the morrow, the tents had to be moved again, and there rushed back into the patriarch's soul all the restless uncertainties of a vagrant. His inheritance was shifting, movable, and transient. He was possessor only by spasms. There was no rich, unbroken, continuous life to create in his soul the settledness of home.

We must emphasize the contrast between the city and the tent. The patriarch lived in the tent; he looked for the city. The tent has no foundations. Its holdfasts are only for transient usage. They are made to be easily changed. The city has foundations. It is stable, fixed, permanent. The tent is the symbol of vagrancy; the city is the symbol of home. The tent is associated with the evanescent and changing; the city is associated with the continuous and the abiding. Abraham dwelt in the land of promise in tents, but "he looked for a city." He longed for settledness. He yearned for the abiding.

Now, we are all the children of promise. A kingdom has been promised to us—not a material kingdom, traversed by lines of latitude and longitude, but a spiritual kingdom, the inheritance of the saints in light. This kingdom abounds in "things that are freely given to us of God"—moral forces, spiritual graces, strengths and beauties from the sanctuary of the Eternal.

Some of us have crossed the borders of the land. We are in the kingdom of promise. But how? Some are in the kingdom in shifting tents. Others are in the kingdom in settled cities. Some people's religious life is full of a restless change; others have a life full of a deep and fruitful homeliness, of rich and assured peace. How many of us only enjoy the kingdom by spasms! We have short seasons of possession. We are dwellers in tents, and have no fixed and settled abode. It is the gracious purpose of our Lord that our religious life should be a certain and continuous possession. He wants it to be a ceaseless "abiding," and not a few detached and uncertain seasons. J. H. J.

The Child-Like Spirit

MONDAY. Matt. 18 : 3. "Except ye become as little children." It is possible to be as a little child without being childish. It is possible to be simple without being a simpleton. Great men and women are noted for their childlike simplicity. The saint on his knees can see farther than the scientist on his toes. The faith of a child is nearer to the fundamentals of God than the doubting of a full-grown man. By faith one enters the Kingdom of all good things. There is no dead line for the open mind, the receptive spirit, the teachable life.

A writer tells us how Phillips Brooks kept alive the child-like spirit of inquiry and investigation, when a gas-fitter came into his study to repair a fixture on his desk. The Bishop asked about every screw and appliance. No child ever showed a more naive curiosity in a new toy. But this was the key to the Bishop's whole character. Like John Richard Green, "he died learning." Froebel, the founder of the kindergarten, insisted that no man could have real joy in living or quicken other lives who did not keep the child's joy in living, the eager interest in life and truth to the end, living with his windows always open toward the East. Henry Ward Beecher sat at the feet of all kinds of people and learned from hackman, stevedore, street-sweeper, and all. This is the explanation of the freshness, spontaneity, readiness and cosmopolitanism of his wonderful pulpit deliverances. Humility is an asset. "Unto me who am less than the least."

The truly great regard themselves as pigmies before the mountainous conceptions that are everywhere. "Less than the least" is a comparative superlative and not perhaps the good English of the schools, but it is the good speech of the child-like heart. In his eighty-fourth year, John Wesley said, "I am still at school." At almost the same age, Goethe said, "I carry my satchel yet." Martin Luther said, "It is not a little thing to speak before men in the place of God." This was the natural recoil of a great soul from a responsible task.

Jesus was interested in the humblest man or woman, and made himself akin to them by entering into their joys as well as their sorrows. Beneath the shadow of His cross on which He was to die, He kept the heart of a little child, and expressed Himself in the midst of the simplicities of life. R. B.

A Wonderful Prayer

TUESDAY. Prov. 30 : 7-9. "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: lest I be full and deny thee and say, 'Who is the Lord?' or lest I be poor, and steal and take the name of my God in vain." Agur's prayer was a wise one. Avarice in its very nature is atheism. It denies God by setting up a yellow god beside Him. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon," said Jesus.

The tendency of increasing wealth is increasing pride and self-sufficiency. The rich fool in one of the Parables gave no credit to anybody but himself for what he had accumulated. This denial of God is the canker of gold. The pride of the Laodiceans is the pride of all the purse-proud: "Because thou sayest I am rich and increased in goods and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked, thus saith the Lord, 'I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve that thou mayest see.'"

The second prayer of Agur was, "Give me not poverty." Nothing so singular about that. From gnawing hunger and winter's cold, good Lord, deliver us! Agur was afraid, too, lest he might steal. Indolence is dishonesty; envy is theft. His third reason for dreading poverty is because it may lead him to dishonor the name of God. The reference is not to profane swearing, as we understand it, but to the heedless and unnecessary use of the august Name.

A wonderful prayer is this of Agur! The middle state is what he covets; not poverty nor riches but food convenient for him; that is to say, enough to keep him in the temperate zone of comfort. This is the third estate, where men live nearest to God. "Take no anxious thought for your life," said Jesus, "what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink or what ye shall put on." Anxiety is the enemy of peace. Fret is the opposite of faith. Therefore, trust in God! If Christ be yours, all things are yours. D. J. B.

The Runner and the Race

WEDNESDAY. I Cor. 9 : 24. "They which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize. Even so run, that ye may attain." Courtland Van Rensselaer Hodge was always strong on athletics. As a lad he played scrub ball. He was a hard player to tackle on the college foot-ball team. He also played a strong, swift game of tennis, swam and skated as well as or better than the most of us, and was an all 'round athlete at Princeton and the University of Pennsylvania. When he went into the games, he went in to do his best to win. He ran to win the prize and usually won it. Then, after a while, young Hodge tackled a new game—the medical missionary work in China. With his young bride he sailed, landed and had hardly stripped for action when he was slain by the Boxer uprising in 1900. Hodge met his death as a brave Christian gentleman. He had a great fund of humor, was bright and merry and fond of life, but he knew when his end was about to come. The prize he won at last, quite different from those he had won at college, was an imperishable one. He received it at the hands of his Master.

When the Master of Life comes to check up your score, the question will not be raised,—Did you win? but—How did you run? The Corinthian Christians to whom Paul wrote understood the imagery perfectly, for he wisely drew his illustrations from the circumstances with which they were surrounded. The stadium was the most frequented place in Corinth. The foot-race was always a struggle for mastery, and no runner could stop to look back. He must press on. Tier upon tier above him loomed "the cloud of witnesses." Paul himself had told the elders at Miletus that he desired to finish his course. And he afterwards told Timothy that he had finished it and felt content because he had done his best. H. P. H.

The Holy Spirit the Best Guide

THURSDAY. Luke, 12 : 57. "Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" The Master marvelled that the men of His day applied their common sense so little to the understanding of religious matters. Whenever they exercised their faculties in other directions, as in interpreting natural phenomena, they came to useful conclusions. But for some reason they did not undertake to find the deeper meaning of life by the same methods. Evidently Jesus believed that ordinary human beings had the power of insight, which would guide them into truth, if only they employed it.

We are fortunately not left to ourselves in judging what is right. Help is abundantly at hand. However, we need to recover confidence in our own endowment of common sense. While the testimony of experience is occasionally helpful, it is a sad mistake to lean too much on the mind of others, whatever their credentials. Why not look at the facts through the eyes of the understanding God has given unto us? The Holy Spirit is able to use ordinary intelligence. Beware of the super-man, the expert, whose views of life are often distorted. Trust in God and do your own thinking! W. L. G.

The Empty Vine

FRIDAY. Hos. 10 : 1. "Israel is an empty vine, he bringeth forth fruit unto himself." This is a double charge—emptiness and selfishness. Israel was not content with failure to bring forth the fruits of righteousness, but had set about fostering the sin of sins—catering to self. But in it all he had still kept up the pretense of being religious. He had built altars, and made "goodly images," and no doubt did many other things, but the difficulty was in the fact that underneath it all was a "divided heart."

No man can serve God with a divided heart. Sometimes we say "no man can serve God fully with a divided heart"; but that is only half the truth, for as a matter-of-fact, the divided heart cannot serve God at all! Jesus laid great emphasis upon this basic principle of Christian life when he said "no man can serve two masters." He can try, but the result is ever the same. Sooner or later he discovers that what he supposed was a fair division of his interests was terribly one-sided, and that self was the favored side.

The only wise thing—nay the only safe thing, is to see to it that we bring forth the fruits of righteousness. See what God says to Israel: "Their heart is divided; . . . he shall break down their altars, he shall spoil their images." But He has promised that if we make His interests our sole concern, He will look after our interests, great and small. I. D. L.

Effectual Help

SATURDAY. Heb. 4 : 16. "Grace to help in every time of need." There are two kinds of causes—instrumental and immediate causes (or proximate causes, as they are sometimes called) and ultimate causes, generally spoken of as effective causes. When a baseball bat strikes a ball, the bat is the proximate or instrumental cause, but the arm of the player, or rather his will, is the effective cause. The words effective and effectual are synonymous.

There is the story of a lame beggar at the temple gate. Seeing two men approach he asked alms, exposing a distorted foot. One of the men said: "We have no money, but we have power to heal you. In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk." Looking down the beggar saw he had been cured, and rose up and walked. If the apostles had given him the alms he asked that would have been immediate help. But when they gave him a good ankle, power to help himself, they gave him effectual help.

Jesus Christ came to the world to give help to the needy race. There is little difference between the words "saviour" and "helper." "Mighty to save" means mighty to help. But Jesus Christ has a method in saving—in helping. He is an effectual helper. In this He is like God—He is ever the God-like Christ.

Here is a man in trouble. He is debt or in need. Creditors are pressing. He prays for help. If God will only send him money now, he will be grateful. Perhaps God does send him money. That has happened many a time. But it does not always happen. Suppose it does not happen. Suppose instead, God permits him to suffer, and in a sudden access of wisdom the man sees there are other methods of meeting the demands, or with desperate courage, he goes to work to earn the money he needs. Or, he fails—compromises with his creditors. There is many an honest bankrupt. Then slowly he goes to work to rebuild his fortune. As time passes, he sees his failure was a blessing; he has learned a valuable lesson. He is a better man because once he failed. Is it not possible to see, in that sudden access of wisdom or in that wonderful exercise of courage, or in the fine spirit in which the man rebuilt upon the ruins of an old business the structure of a better, the effectual help of God? Instrumental help would have solved a temporary problem, but effectual help solves a problem that is lifelong, and that may be eternity-long. C.

HOOD TIRES

Hood—You know the quality

And now a Ford tire at a price every motorist can pay.

Made Oversize to give it still greater life because it better bears the load—

The Raised Tread, that grips the muddy, country road—

The Depressed Tread, that provides against skidding on the slippery city street—

The Ribbed Sides which protect against rut wear.

With these unbeatable features, plus the known Hood quality, at approximately $22.50, this new style Hood for Fords is far and away the best tire buy for the small car-owner today.

The Red Man in the window means the Hood dealer's place.

Rest and Recreation

International Sunday School Lesson for May 8
Lev. 23:39-43; Deut. 5:12-25; Mark 6:31, 32

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THE title does not go this time to the heart of the lesson. As the Bible is the book among books, so Sunday is the best day of all the week. God has been gracious in providing the night time to recuperate our tired bodies, but nights are not enough. By the end of each week the physical powers are noticeably less than on Monday morning. If, however, Sunday is made the rest day intended by God Monday morning will find our strength back to normal. This is a scientific fact, but science and religion are in perfect harmony. The right use of the Christian Sabbath is the great fact to be studied this week.

Just to read the lesson text, though we have three portions this time, is insufficient. The first selection introduces us to the Feast of Tabernacles, one of the three great occasions during the Hebrew year when the Jew was to go up to Jerusalem for the celebration if possible. The Passover and the Feast of Weeks should also be noted, and to these should be added in special study the Jewish New Year and the Day of Atonement. The two last and the Feast of Tabernacles are in the seventh month of the Jewish year. Use your Bibles constantly in the lessons of this quarter, and get the general facts concerning each book of the Bible, as the scripture is taken from the various books. This time you have Leviticus, Deuteronomy and Mark. Nelson's Cross Reference Bible or the Scofield Bible are very helpful for such study. Turn also to any good Bible Dictionary.

Though the Jew was a busy man his law required him to take time for rest, recreation and worship, in addition to the fifty-two Sabbaths each year. Remember that these feasts and the fast day Atonement, Sabbatic and Jubilee years, are times which Jehovah claimed as His, and man was sinful who did not obey the divine commands with reference to them. Man must use such times according to God's intent, or sin against Him.

In Deuteronomy we have a restatement of the law "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." If there have been six days of honest labor, there is every reason for resting on the seventh day. God set an example for mankind by resting after His great work of creation. The command to rest is not only with reference to the head of the household but to all who are related to that family—members, helpers, faithful animals. In short, it means the caddy as well as the golfer. If some men sawed wood a little, they would not need to play the gentleman's game so much. The law of the land should affect the rich as well as the poor: certainly both are equal before God's bar of judgment. Those who insist on having their recreation on Sunday have no right in so doing to defraud others of their rightful Sunday rest.

TEACHERS will have serious trouble in handling this lesson if they do not themselves keep the Sabbath holy unto God. The officers and members of the church and Sunday school are often too lax in their own habits on the Lord's Day. God has not revoked His Ten Commandments, and each one is equally in force at the present time. Being in the twentieth century does not change the matter at all. Some communities ask for local option on the question of Sabbath amusement, etc. If a minister wants to hear from his people just let him preach a strong sermon on the subject of the Sabbath.

The Lord's Day Alliance of the United States and the similar alliances in the various states are raising their voices for the protection and non-commercialization of God's Day. During the past thirteen years the Lord's Day Alliance of New Jersey has been instrumental in the defeat of thirty-six anti-Sabbath bills which were introduced in the legislature at Trenton. During all those years, some churches did not once pass and forward to the legislature a single resolution of protest against any one of these thirty-six vicious bills. Sunday must be protected or soon there will be no Sunday schools. It is great as well as right to be working with God and His law, rather than against the Creator and His perfect plan for His creation.

This is the lesson that will be studied on Mother's Day and the suggestion is naturally of the home. Sunday should always be Mother's Day, after she has wrought so well during the week and arranged for the comfort of all in the home. It should certainly be her resting time, though it is too often true that mother's leisure time is "just time to do some other kind of work." Some one tried to comfort a dying mother with thoughts about heaven as a wonderful place for service, and mother refused to be comforted until it was stated that heaven was a place of resting. That appealed to her. There would be more of heaven on earth for mother if she could have more rest and recreation down here, before she entered into that place where the Feast of Tabernacles is fulfilled, even Heaven itself. One good way to celebrate May 8 as Mother's Day would be to make mother a real guest in the home. Such attention might surprise her, but she would react without any heart-failure.

IT IS a wonderful experience to see city boys and girls get their first sight of the country when sent out for two weeks by the Fresh Air Fund, to Mont-Lawn for instance. Summer time will soon offer another opportunity for more of this kind of rest and recreation. It costs money, time and work, but the dividends are glorious. Cities are making provisions for the physical and mental recreations of their young citizens. Recreation must be constructive and never destructive. Morality is greatly advanced by reason of physical exercise.

Everyone needs resting times. Summer vacations are not weeks that are lost to the employer. Rather he gains in more and better work done for him upon the return of the vacationist. Such days are periods of real recreation which is the best definition of recreation.

There is a growing tendency in non-Christian lands to make Sunday the rest time, rather than an arbitrary day in the month. Meanwhile the meaning of the Christian Sabbath is making its impression. When at Nikko, Japan last September, the writer went to a barber on Friday. The barber, who could not speak English, declined to attend to business but said "Sunday, come Monday." The fact was that it was Friday. On asking the hotel clerk about it he could give no explanation until he noted that it was September 17, and then stated that the one rest day in the month for the barbers was the 17th and the only way that barber could make the foreigner understand that he did not work that day was to call it "Sunday." What would that non-Christian think about the Christian's sacred day, if he should be in New York or Los Angeles, on the first day of the week!

Jesus, in Mark 6:31, invited His faithful disciples who were tired in the midst of their work to "Come apart and rest a while." They went with their Master. He is still the best Companion for tired folks. He is the burden-bearer and always has His words of comfort. He is the one who speaks peace to the soul. One of the greatest gifts from our heavenly Father is His Day, which, thank God, comes every seventh day. This Sabbath is a blessed foretaste. People who find it a real task to keep the earthly Sabbath holy will need to be made over, or the eternal Sabbath will be to them misery instead of blessing.

The screen will be what you make it

THE great public interest in the betterment of motion pictures is to a large degree a tribute to the efforts of Paramount Pictures.

No film organization in the world can produce such a store of photoplays which make for finer screen entertainment, from such instructive motion pictures as Maeterlinck's "The Blue Bird" to that electrifying masterpiece, George Loane Tucker's "The Miracle Man." Listed in the panel alongside are further examples of current Paramount Pictures.

But you who care about keeping motion pictures up to the Paramount standard must remember that the sign of your sincerity is your support.

If you fail to attend the Paramount Pictures which come to your theatre you practically tell the Manager that you have no interest in screen betterment, and you miss a wonderful entertainment into the bargain.

There are over 11,200 men in the United States who are managing theatres that regularly show Paramount Pictures as the main part of the program.

What are you and your community doing to show these men that you approve good pictures and that you want them, and that you will support them collectively if you get them?

It's up to you.

The screen will be just what you make it.

Paramount Pictures will help you make it just what you want it to be. Support them.

The Comfort-Bringer

"Yes—I'm Getting 7% And My Money's Safe"

After supper last night I went down to the post office for the mail and found a letter from G. L. Miller & Company in my box. In it was a check for interest due on a Miller First Mortgage Bond.

As I was reading the letter Dr. Thompson came along. He glanced over my shoulder and saw what it was. He knew I had been investing in Miller Bonds for several years.

"Well, Mac," he said, "are you still getting your 7%?"

"Yes, Doctor, I am still getting my 7%. By the way, what is your mining stock paying?"

"Not a blame cent," he said, making a wry face. "Hereafter my motto is going to be 'Safety'. You seem to be mighty well pleased with your Miller Bonds. Are you sure they are safe?"

"They are secured by a first mortgage on good, modern apartment houses or other buildings, well located in prosperous Southern cities. These buildings earn a steady income, and you can't get a much better guarantee of safety than a first mortgage, can you?"

"But suppose," he objected, "the value of the building on which the bonds are issued declines for one cause or another. Isn't your security in danger?"

"Not at all," I told him. "In the first place, G. L. Miller & Company lend only about one-half of the value of the property, and that value isn't based on boom prices, either, but on a fair, ordinary market. In the second place, the borrower has to make monthly payments to meet the interest and gradually pay off the principal. In this way money is always on hand to pay the interest even before it is due, and to pay off the bonds which come due from year to year. The bond issue is growing less every year, and the interest which has to be paid is growing less, but the mortgage on the building remains as full security until the last bond is paid. Don't you see, these bonds are growing safer all the time?"

Dr. Thompson was interested and impressed, but determined to push his investigations further. He had learned a lesson from his mining stocks.

"Any chance of legal slips, faulty titles, or things like that?" he asked. "You have got to be particular in dealing in real estate."

"Well," I answered, "every precaution that a lawyer can think of is taken. Miller & Company have an independent lawyer pass on the legality of each bond issue, after examining the title. The attorney also sees to the drawing up of the deed of trust. A bank or trust company certifies to the genuineness of the bonds. Miller checks up the records to see that taxes on the property are paid and see that fire insurance is kept up."

"Let me have Miller's address," said Dr. Thompson, taking out his pencil. "I am going to send for some more information about those bonds."

You, who read this advertisement, may have a neighbor who is an investor in Miller Bonds. We know that there are Miller investors in your State, for they live in every State of the Union. Not one of them ever had to wait a day for money due on interest or principal of Miller First Mortgage Bonds. We will gladly send you a booklet called "Demonstrations of Satisfaction," reproducing actual letters from these satisfied investors. "Creating Good Investments" tells how Miller Bonds are made and why they are safe. "Two Men and Their Money" tells an instructive investment story from every-day life. Mail the coupon today.

a plate of hot and delicately browned toast, daintily broiled ham, and, for dessert, peaches and little cakes from the store in the pantry.

Mr. Green, dipping his toast in his coffee, watched her with undisguised admiration. Evidently there were city girls and city girls; this one knew how to do things, she'd need no instruction from the neighbors.

"I didn't have any eggs," Ruth apologized, "but you just wait till I get my white Leghorns, and I'll offer them to you in more ways than you've ever eaten. And make a tidy little sum, I hope, selling them. How is the market, Mr. Donaldson?"

"The city is no so very far away, and they'll ship fine. Eggs is woman's work, or I'd ha' been in the beesiness myself," said the farmer. "I'm a lone body wi' out help, ye see."

Mr. Green, who insisted upon staying, helped Donaldson and Mr. Gary put up the beds—one in the guest-room for Mr. Gary, and the other in the sunny chamber upstairs, the southwest room that had been long ago decided upon as her own, when she and her grandfather had discussed their plans. The beds were perfect; Ruth had seen to that. Mr. Gary declared that he slept so well that he had serious thoughts of giving up his law practice, and staying on as a permanent guest. Whereat Ruth laughed delightedly—a true hostess is always happy when her guests are comfortable.

CHAPTER III

THE next day Ruth, Mr. Gary and Donaldson went over the little farm; it was a small one, hardly fifty acres, but every foot had been made to yield the fruits of the earth justly, for the old Scotchman was a good farmer, and kept his soil enriched and cultivated.

There were flourishing orchards and carefully trained berry vines, with crisp vegetables for market—enough to keep more than one man busy. Donaldson said he employed little labor, except when the berries were ripe, then he hired children from the village, because he could get them cheap. Tom Auld, who lived on the adjoining farm, helped him a bit.

"I'll tell you the truth, my dear," said Mr. Gary to Ruth, when they had parted from the farmer at his door—he had a small, two-room dwelling, built of red brick, with vines trained over the walls and a neat dooryard filled with flowers—"my opinion is that our friend Donaldson loves money more than anything in this world. He is a miser, whose joy is to make his money and save every dime that is possible. But I think he is faithful to his promise. Drove a hard bargain with me, I may say, but it would have been a harder with you, I'm pretty sure."

They found Mrs. Green at the house when they returned; she was a comfortable old lady of ample girth, and sat panting on one of the broad porch benches, with a white kitten in her lap and a puppy in a basket at her feet.

"I came soon's Father told me you had come," she panted, smilingly. "Got the features of your grandma, honey—her eyes and her nose, smiley mouth. And I fetched along these little creeturs to keep you company."

"Dear, dear, how glad I am to see them!" laughed Ruth, as she unprisoned the curly puppy and let him snuggle up in her arms, where he barked triumphantly at the kitten. "It was mighty kind of you come over, dear Mrs. Green, and to bring me these little things to keep me company."

MRS. GREEN had brought along other things beside the animals—well-filled basket of home-made preserves, a plate of doughnuts and an apple-pie, fresh baked and smelling deliciously.

"Father said—he's fetching over them plumbers and folks, honey, they'll be right out—that, for all you were town-bred, you could whirl in and get a meal with the best of us. But I knew that stove wouldn't be ready for pies, till you get your kitchen red up."

"I want a girl to live with me, somebody to help with the work," said Ruth, after the good things had been duly praised. "Do you know one, Mrs. Green?"

"Poor Ellen Hawtree," nodded Mrs. Green, "she's a good girl, not overly bright, but willing. Strong and hearty, though. She's an orphan, and she ain't had very good treatment from the folks she's lived out with. Lives with the Smithers family, now, and they work her hard and don't feed over liberal. Ellen's twenty-one, to my knowledge, and she's a word to say for herself, now. Think you could put up with her, honey?"

"Ellen is the very girl I want," nodded Ruth, emphatically. "And she's coming as soon as you can get her from the Smithers family!"

"This very day," declared Mrs. Green, rising. "Smithers can say what they please. Ellen's twenty-one, and got a right to work for wages, instead of mighty poor victuals and worse clothes."

Mrs. Green was successful in her mission; she returned that afternoon with Ellen sitting on her trunk in the wagon.

"The Smithers suddenly found she was valuable, and offered wages, which Ellen wouldn't take, because I told her not to," avowed Mrs. Green, as the "help" climbed out. A tall, awkward girl, with a bewildered look on her face, her roughened red hands twitching nervously in the folds of her check apron, and her feet rubbing against the cowhide brogans that encased them. Ruth's heart swelled at sight of her, and she took one of the red hands in her own, smiling into the startled eyes.

"I've such a nice little room for Ellen, right next my own," she said cheerfully, "and we'll have her trunk taken right up. And then she shall have a lunch, and a nice hot cup of tea."

And Ellen, the dazed look in her eyes succeeding to one of admiration that was to deepen into adoration, followed her new employer into the house.

NOW the place was filled with workmen, and from morning to night the sound of their hammers and saws and the smell of their soldering pots filled the air. Poor Mr. Gary, Ruth saw, was like a fish out of its native fluid, and she finally persuaded him to leave her, with Ellen and the all-capable Donaldson to look after her.

Ellen was a treasure indeed; she was slow to comprehend, but faithful and clean—indeed she spent so much of her time cleaning up after the workmen that Ruth had constantly to remind her that it was a waste of time, until they had finished.

"Law, Miss Ruth, I jest love to be cleanin' up for you," said Ellen, worshipping Ruth with her eyes, "it ain't for money, no'm—for pure love!"

Just as soon as she could Ruth took her help into the village, bought material and had Miss Susanna Baines, the village seamstress, make her some new clothes, so that Ellen fairly blossomed in blue and pink chambray house dresses and neat calf oxfords, which she constantly admired, so that she was apt to be tripped up, sometimes, by her own feet, in striving to view them from all angles.

Neighbors came calling as soon as Mrs. Green had spread the news of Ruth's arrival; there were not many girls, these had gone to the cities to find employment, as had the young men of the neighborhood. Ruth was reminded of "Cranford," where only old maids, widows and retired army officers lived, there was such a scarcity of young people.

VERY early Ruth learned of Nancy Auld, the mother of young Tom, owner of the farm adjoining hers. Nancy Auld was a paralytic, and young Tom had to "do for her," in the absence of a daughter. And young Tom spent most of his time working for Donaldson to pay the interest on money borrowed from the latter—the interest on a mortgage which, from appearances, had small chance of ever being paid.

"But then, if he didn't pay interest,

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address: Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1. Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6 1/2 per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 39. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1929 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107 1/2 per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent. are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7.1 per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co. 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Record of Investments Chart—a simple chart for listing your securities which shows at a glance your monthly and annual income, together with necessary information on Federal Taxes—Ask for Circular 39.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/2%—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds, Booklet 42.

Barnsdall Corporation, 7 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold bonds to yield about 9 per cent. own and operate properties in 14 States. Total net assets 377 per cent. of this issue. Circular 40.

Circular 41 gives full information concerning a 7 per cent First and Refunding Mortgage Bond yielding about 8 per cent. 1929 earnings amounted to more than twice the annual interest charges on all underlying bonds including this issue.

it would be foreclosed, and poor Nancy turned out of house and home," said Mrs. Abner Green. "That old Scotchman, honey, ain't anything in his breast but a flint—nary thing!"

"I see," nodded Ruth, comprehendingly. "I've never been over to Tom Auld's house, though I've seen the smoke from his chimneys often. And I have noticed how poorly the crops looked on his land. Donaldson told me he was just 'shiftless-like,' when I asked the reason for this. Now I'll visit Nancy Auld; maybe there will be something I can do to help."

"There's a girl, Mary Smithers, old Jacob Smithers' daughter—the man Ellen worked for—who is Tom's sweetheart, only old Jacob won't hear to them marryin' till Tom gets out o' the woods. And Mary ain't spunk enough to run off and marry him anyway. Come to think of it, though," concluded Mrs. Green, with a little laugh at her oversight, "Tom wouldn't let her to do it if she was a mind to. No; he thinks it would be workin' a hardship on the poor girl, when she's fair fading away, in my opinion, from hopelessness."

"Oh, wouldn't it be wonderful to have a lot of money!" breathed Ruth, misty-eyed. "I have never wanted any before, but now—why wouldn't it be fine to pay off the mortgage and have enough to build a dear little cottage and start housekeeping for them?"

"Yes," agreed Mrs. Green, drily, "it would, child, only they wouldn't take it—not Tom Auld! Proud as Lucifer, that stock; most equal to Miss Em'ly David, our schoolma'am, you know, who won't accept favors from the neighbors because she can't return 'em. No, we dasn't offer help, even neighborly help, to Miss Em'ly. And it wouldn't do to think of givin' money to Tom, if so be we was rich as old John D. hisself."

"Well, if Nancy Auld isn't above accepting neighborly attentions, I'll certainly do what I can for her, at least, seeing I haven't any money to assist Tom, providing he'd take it," laughed Ruth, happily. "Thank goodness, I can cook—and I took a course in home nursing, too; maybe there will be something I can do to make Mrs. Auld more comfortable."

SO ONE morning very soon after this conversation found Ruth, bearing a dainty tray loaded with good things for the invalid, walking with determined feet toward the fence that separated her own farm from that of her "shiftless" neighbor. Beyond the low fence, made of boulders piled up, there was no trace of the careful, intensive cultivation that marked her own farm; still the untrained beauty of the woods, and the silky murmur of a little stream that rippled through them delighted Ruth's beauty-loving eyes. For a short space she followed the path that wound by the side of the brook, then paused, with an exclamation of delighted surprise.

The stream had its end in a pool, broad and placid, bordered by flags and rushes, and curly beds of fresh green water-cress. The tiny stream was its outlet, the waters that filled the pool came from a foaming, dimpling spring—a little basin of crystal water that tumbled over wave-worn rocks and poured its burden into the placid bowl of the pool.

Fringing it, spring and pool alike, were thickets of willows that hid it from view until one entered their green feathery screen.

"The man who owns this must be a lover of nature," thought Ruth, as she stood on the brink and watched her reflection in the white water, "else he would cut down the willows, drain the pool, plow the land. And that would be just sacrilege to a nature-lover, plain sacrilege! I'm inclined to like this shiftless farmer boy, just from his spring. And I do believe I want a drink; I see he has a cup handy, hanging from that willow bough."

She drank deeply, filling the rusty tin cup from the foaming lip to the little spring, and found the water delicious.

"It's so pretty—so very much prettier than anything on my own farm, I'm inclined to envy him," murmured Ruth, as she hung the cup once more on its willow branch, "but Donaldson, I'm afraid, would find it just waste to let the good land lie idle; I'm inclined to think that a dollar is the loveliest object in the world to my farmer!"

ONCE more she followed the path, winding steeply up the hillside, on whose summit was placed Tom Auld's cottage—an ancient and dilapidated little house, which looked very tumble-down and disheartened, with its peeling paint and its patched window-panes, its door-yard filled with half-hearted, struggling shrubs, evidently hoary with age, and its equally half-hearted weeds, both seeming to have a hard existence on the barren ground.

But the old house was embowered in the shade of noble elms, and from the dooryard one caught a glimpse of the winding road that led to the village, and a sweep of beautiful green hills and pleasant farmsteads. On the side lay the arable land belonging to the farmer, but the fields were filled with faint-hearted corn, and the orchard was old and half bare—while the fruit on Ruth's trees was so abundant.

"Poor soul—he needs that Mary Smithers to help him struggle out of the depths," murmured Ruth, sorrowfully; "this place has such an air of discouragement about it all. I hope it doesn't affect Nancy Auld as it does me!"

Up the worn path, through the stones of which grass and weeds sprouted drearily, Ruth walked to the porch.

A furious sound of clicking and pounding came from an open door at one end of the long porch—somebody was pounding a typewriter for dear life.

"Dear me, sounds like business school, with all the machines going at once," mused Ruth, as she tiptoed softly to the door, and knocked—a useless proceeding, for with the noise within no one could hear her.

"I wonder, now, if Tom Auld is at that machine," Ruth reflected, "when he ought to be plowing, maybe. Funny thing for a farmer to be doing. Well, I'll just enter!"

She pushed the door wide and boldly stood in the doorway. "Good morning," said Ruth, cheerfully, "I came to see—"

She got no further. A man arose from a seat at the typewriter table—a man gaunt, wild-eyed, glaring through enormous spectacles, with shaggy black locks hanging over his forehead, a shaggy growth of beard shading his mouth—a fearsome figure of a man, who waved her away with an impatient hand.

"Another time—not now," implored this apparition, in tones tense with pleading, "for goodness' sake, get out!"

A Mission Surprise

SURPRISES are common enough in mission work, but not long ago a missionary in India received a surprise which almost amounted to shell-shock. A little village near Meerut had decided to become Christian and the minister had gone down to conduct the community baptism service.

Now it was generally known that the landlord, who had previously owned the people body and soul, greatly objected to the freeing of his tenants through Christianity. For he knew that Christianity meant freedom—freedom from fear, freedom from the terrorism which kept the people ground down under his power.

On the day of the baptism service this landlord was in the congregation, a fact which produced general uneasiness. And as the service advanced the uneasiness increased almost to the point of terror, for just as the minister was about to baptize the first convert, the landlord came forward and took the vessel from the hand of the Indian worker who was assisting.

The people gasped, but the situation was explained in an instant. The landlord had suddenly changed his mind about the matter of Christianity, and wished to take part in the rite of baptism as a sign of his approval.

When the landlord learned that four members of the community were away from home and therefore could not be baptized before the minister hurried away to another of his forty stations, he offered to see the men when they came back and to administer the rite himself.

The "Iron Foods" Like Raisins Bring Youthful Looks

—According to Authorities

HERE are luscious raisin foods that help promote youthful looks by keeping the cheeks rosy.

Raisins are rich in iron, which is necessary to keep the blood supplied with red corpuscles. Your daily food must not fail to furnish this tiny bit of iron. Raisins are one of the richest of foods in the assimilable kind.

Thus a few raisins every day will meet the vital need.

Learn what raisins add to boiled rice, bread pudding and other puddings and desserts.

Serve them with the children's oatmeal, and in cakes, cookies, rolls, corn bread, et cetera.

Serve stewed raisins with stewed prunes. Note the new zest in these foods with raisins.

Raisins increase nutrition also, furnishing 1560 calories of energizing nutriment per pound.

Who's Had Biscuits Like Them

1 cup SUN-MAID Chopped Raisins
2 cups flour
1/2 teaspoon salt

1 cup milk
2 teaspoons baking powder
2 tablespoons shortening

Sift flour, salt and baking powder into bowl, add the shortening and rub in very lightly, add enough cold milk to hold together, add the raisins and mix. Place dough on floured board, roll or pat with hands until one inch thick, then cut with biscuit cutter and brush tops with cold milk. Bake in hot oven 20 to 25 minutes.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

SUN-MAID RAISINS, which every grocer sells, are made from California's finest table grapes.

You may never taste these grapes because their fragile, juicy, thin-skinned delicacy prevents long-distance shipping. But you can have them in the form of luscious, tender, meaty raisins.

THREE VARIETIES: Sun-Maid Seeded (seeds removed); Sun-Maid Seedless (grown without seeds); Sun-Maid Clusters (on the stem).

Britain Escapes General Strike

A SPLIT in the Triple Alliance of British labor has averted the danger that the National Union of Railwaymen and the Transport Workers Union would strike in support of the miners and has increased the chances for an early agreement between the mine unions and the mine owners. Several days must pass, however, before the mining controversy can be settled and already British industry has been hit hard by the shortage of coal.

Orders had been issued for the strike of railwaymen and transport workers but the leaders of these unions decided to cancel them after Frank Hodges, general secretary of the Miners' Federation, had informed a committee of Parliament that the miners were prepared to examine a scale of wages for a temporary settlement while suspending without prejudice the question of a national pool to maintain wages. Others of the miners' executives repudiated this offer and there was bitter feeling among the labor leaders, but it enabled the chiefs of the other unions to withdraw from a conflict which would have been revolutionary in scope.

In some sections there were revolts against the no-strike decision of the two members of the Triple Alliance, but the prospects were that a few days would see the settlement of the entire controversy and the return of the miners to work.

across three counties in Arkansas before spending its force. A second storm started one hundred miles to the north, while other tornadoes formed in various parts of the territory affected. One of the freaks of the storm occurred in Arkansas when two loaded freight cars were picked up from the middle of a moving train but the train was able to proceed to its destination after the parted sections had been coupled again.

GREEKS DEFEAT TURKISH DRIVE. An offensive by the Turkish Nationalists designed to cut off the Greek forces in the Afium-Kharahissar and Toulou-banar sectors was broken up completely by Greek counter-attacks, according to despatches to Athens, which claimed the capture of 6,000 Turks. Greece has called several classes of reserves to the colors in preparation for the resumption of her offensive which failed at Eski-Shehr.

STEEL PRICES REDUCED. The United States Steel Corporation has announced reductions in the prices of steel ranging from $1.50 a ton for billets up to $15 a ton for tin plate. The reductions, effective at once, did not cover all the corporation's products, but new scales for other products were being worked out. It was expected the price cuts would be followed by an attempt to lower wages.

PUBLIC UTILITIES WIN DECISIONS. Two decisions have been handed down by the United States which may result in increased public utility charges in many cities. One decision affirmed the decree of a lower court enjoining the City of San Antonio from enforcing a five-cent fare despite a franchise contract fixing the fare at that figure; and the other set aside an injunction obtained by the city of Fairfield, Iowa, restraining the Iowa Electric Company from increasing its rates above those set in its franchise, the court holding that a contract calling for a confiscatory rate would not stand in law.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE PASSES "MOVIE" CENSORSHIP BILL. The New York legislature has passed a bill entrusting to a board of three members the censorship over motion pictures to be exhibited in the state and authorizing it to refuse licenses to any films which it may consider "obscene, indecent, immoral, inhuman, sacrilegious or of such a character that their exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime."

Tornado Kills 97 in South

NINETY-SEVEN persons were killed, a score injured seriously and scores suffered minor injuries in a series of tornadoes which swept across six Southern states, causing damage to property aggregating several millions of dollars. The greatest loss of life was in Arkansas, where sixty-six persons were killed. Fourteen were killed in Alabama, nine in Texas and eight in Mississippi; while Georgia and Tennessee, which also suffered from the storm, reported no fatalities. It was feared belated reports from isolated sections would push the death toll still higher.

The first storm originated in Texas near the Arkansas line, and cut a path

Living Close to Christ

C. E. and B. Y. P. U., 1 John 3: 18-24; John 15: 7-10

THIS meeting should be made deeply devotional. Before approaching the study of the theme have a series of sentence prayers. Remember you are going to talk about Jesus Christ. Therefore the mind and heart should be purged from all things alien to such a sacred subject. Divide the program into three sections, thus:

Who is Jesus Christ? Why should we live close to Him? How can we live close to Him?

Write on the blackboard or on some bulletin board in large letters these words: "The right way to begin to walk in the right way is to begin right away. Jesus said, 'I am the Way.'"

We need to live close to Jesus Christ because He makes plain the mysteries of life, of sorrow, of temptation and of failure. Life that is closely related and associated with Him as a traveling companion is less difficult. He gives light in darkness, truth when error conflicts, leading when divers paths bewilder. If He is the world's hope, He is my hope, because as a Christian I am the hope of the world. Jesus Christ is interpreted in what I think and do and say. Note the tree and the branches filled with fruit. The relation of branches and the tree must be vital. The sap, the life, the strength must flow from the trunk to the branches or there can be no fruit. So the very life of Jesus must enter our lives.

What We Owe to Our Parents

E. L., Exo. 20: 12; 1 Sam. 1: 10, 11

MAY 8 is Mother's Day. Make it also Father's Day. Advertise this meeting as "Mother's and Father's day." Invite the parents to attend. Sing as an opening hymn "Faith of Our Fathers." In the last stanza sing "Faith of Our Mothers." Let each member render some verbal tribute to parents. Let some read a poetical tribute, for there is sentiment in the theme and sentiment is never so well expressed as when it is done in poetry.

If this meeting is planned carefully and prayerfully it will be a source of inspiration and profit to all who attend. Write out in bold letters the words of the author of Proverbs, so that all may have them before the eye as the meeting progresses, thus: "Forsake not the law of thy mother," and "Keep the commandments of thy Father." Use as a closing hymn "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

25,000 Words Frequently Mispronounced

There are 25,000 Chances for You to Make Yourself Ludicrous in the Pronunciation of English Words

And yet the man or woman of good breeding cannot afford to take a single one of them.

You should be familiar with the proper pronunciation of these 25,000 tricky words and be ever on your guard against misusing them.

Speech occupies so important a place in the society, business and professional life of our day that its intensive study is practically becoming the hobby of all intelligent citizens.

Slipshod and incorrect pronunciation is taken as a sure sign of careless and indifferent breeding.

A Blunt Mispronunciation of One Important Word May—

Spoil the charm of your conversation—Ruin a good speech—Make a lecture ludicrous—Destroy the power of a sermon—Discount a sales talk—Lessen the prestige of a teacher, and invite derision and discomfiture.

Your train of thought may be valuable and interesting—your grammar may be correct—your appearance faultless—but you destroy the effect of all these if your spoken English is shabby and imperfect.

You may avoid all this by obtaining the new volume.

A Desk Book of 25,000 WORDS Frequently Mispronounced

Compiled by F. H. Vizetelly, Litt. D., LL. D., Managing Editor of The New Standard Dictionary; author of "A Desk Book of Errors in English," etc.

It indicates the correct pronunciation of English words, foreign terms, Bible names, personal names, geographical names, and proper names of all kinds current in literature, science, and the arts. In addition to this, all words that are likely to prove stumbling-blocks, are included. The preferences of the principal dictionaries of the English language are placed on record, and national peculiarities indicated and explained.

Waimangu, near New Zealand's famous hot lakes, is more of a spouting volcano than a geyser ago came the great conquering race of Incas which swept over all the vast tablelands of Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador, until they were the acknowledged rulers of South America, building their cities, their palaces and temples which are still the wonders of the archeologist. Surely Titicaca, for many reasons, has a right to hold up its lofty head.

ONE of its bigger and more important rivals in many ways is Lake Baikal in the heart of Siberia. It stretches north and south for four hundred miles, and is comparatively narrow. It fills a tremendous chasm in the earth's surface, a mile and a half deep, clear as crystal and even in summertime it is only a degree or two warmer than ice.

I remember a weary day which I once spent at the little railway station of Lisovitchnia on the verge of the lake, waiting for the big ice-breaker to take us across. Hour after hour we waited with two hundred other passengers, all of us sitting on our baggage on the dreary platform, or taking short walks, not daring to go too far, lest the boat should come. I ventured to take a plunge in the icy waters, but "right in and right out" was enough.

At last the twelve hour wait was over, the great lumbering ice-breaker, capable of taking two long trains into its capacious maw, steamed to the wharf; the weary, hungry passengers tumbled aboard, and learned to their disgust that the big steamer had been long delayed in order that the Imperial Minister of Justice might get to the boat, have a good dinner, a chat with his friends, and perform other unessentials.

Of course toward the end of June there is no ice to break in Lake Baikal, though it does not go out until far into May, but the ice-breaker which, when built was one of the wonders of the world, plows its way across, summer and winter, and even smashes its iron beak through ice four or five feet in thickness.

MY third lake is as hot as Lake Baikal is cold. It is in New Zealand, that land of thermal wonders. There are a multitude of hot lakes in this wonderland of the North Land, some large and some small. This one, called Rotamahana, is the largest and most famous. We embarked on its cooler shore in a rowboat manned by swarthy Maoris. At first we could easily hold our hands in the water as we dabbled them over the side. It was a mile to the farther shore. As we advanced, the water grew warmer and warmer, hotter and hotter, until we found ourselves over a very witches' cauldron. The water was actually boiling furiously, and only the thin planks of the rowboat stood between us and a dreadful death. The steaming bubbles, superheated, thumped against the bottom and sides of the boat, making anything but a merry tattoo. At last we reached the farther shore, and stepped gingerly on the hot sand, while jets of steam spurted out on every side and enveloped the hills just beyond the lake, in a perpetual white cloud.

A little ways farther on is the world-famous geyser of Waimangu. It is more a spouting volcano than a geyser, for it throws up mud and stones and water and huge boulders, sometimes hundreds of feet in the air. A mile high the steam from this horrid vent hole of nature rises in its periodic discharges, which, if I remember rightly, come once in twenty-three hours. A number of years ago the most tremendous explosion of modern times occurred; a big section of the mountain was torn off and scattered over the surrounding country for fifty miles, burying some sections seventy feet deep in ashes and pumice.

LET us turn from this scene of nature's terrific violence, to a lake of calm and peaceful memories. It lies at the head of the Jordan Valley, surrounded by smiling hills and flower-decked shores. You know its name before I write it. It is the lake made sacred by the frequent presence of our dear Lord. Around its shores and on its waters He walked, on its calm and stormy waves He sailed. When the winds from the hills around swooped down upon it He bade them be still, and there was a great calm.

In a little boat rocking on its tide He sat and talked to the people on the shore, of the sower who went out to sow, of the wheat and the tares, of the grain of mustard-seed, and of the heaven.

"O Galilee! sweet Galilee!
Where Jesus loved so much to be.
O Galilee! blue Galilee!
Come, sing thy song again to me."

There can never be another lake in all this wide world to compare with Galilee! Its interest is supreme, commanding, unending, for He who sailed its waters and walked its marge was the Son of Man and the Son of God.

Fatigue that comes with winter's end is caused by vitamine deficiency in winter foods

Physicians now know that no medicine, only certain foods, can furnish this needed element

ONE trouble with most of us in the spring is that the food we eat in winter doesn't have the essential vitamins that we get in summer from fresh vegetables—lettuce, spinach, green things. We get heavy and dull; they used to call it "spring fever." We are more susceptible to illness and sluggishness in the spring than at any other time.

Old foods and new

Add to this poverty of the vitalizing quality in foods the fact that whims of taste have caused us to eliminate much of the best in the food we do eat. The best part of the grains we use is removed to make the product more pleasing to the eye; the most nutritious part of vegetables and fruits is often pared off.

A common food rich in vitamins

Now, the lack of this vital element in foods, vitamins, can be supplied by the use of yeast. This simple, common household article contains a greater amount of vitamins than any other food known.

That worn-out feeling means that your body requires more vitamins. Even with a diet properly varied, the food you take may not contain a sufficient quantity of vitamins. The addition of Yeast Foam, two or three cakes a day, may easily supply the lack.

Thousands of people have discovered this simple aid to health and are today benefiting from its stimulating and revitalizing properties.

The best ways to take Yeast Foam

Eat a third, half or a whole cake three times a day before meals

Many eat it buttered like a cracker. Some prefer to take a bite of yeast cake and a bite of cracker without butter.

Others eat it plain and wash it down with a little water or milk. You will soon learn to like the taste.

Others carry a package around with them so a cake may be eaten at convenient times.

Yeast removes cause of skin troubles

Skin disorders, boils, pimples, usually are indications of internal troubles. As it improves the health, Yeast Foam also clears the skin by furnishing the essential vitamine, the lack of which in an unbalanced diet is often the principal cause of unsightly complexions.

New Students Enrolling Fast

Rev. J. H. Ralston, D. D.
Secretary of the Correspondence Department

Business in the Correspondence Department of The Moody Bible Institute is far from dull in this time of business depression. The general falling off in buying and other adverse conditions have, of course, had some effect. The long delayed advance in the prices of our courses, made necessary to bring them nearer to the cost basis, went into effect September 1, 1920. Then heavy advances in the advertising rates of some publications of large circulation made it necessary to discontinue using them, and others also had to be dropped at least temporarily because of failure to produce results.

Nevertheless, new enrolments for the months of October, November, December, 1920, and January, 1921, numbered 1,164—384, or 24.8 per cent. less than for the corresponding months a year ago, and 171 less than for the four immediately preceding months, June, July, August and September, 1920.

Due to the large volume of new enrolments in the past year, the figures for the number of students now under instruction show a gratifying increase. January 31, 1920, the active students totaled 5,550; on January 31, 1921, they numbered 7,325—an increase of 1,775, or 32 per cent!

We praise God for every one of the 1,164 new students, and for the large increase in the total number of active students, and ask all who read this advertisement to unite with us in prayer that the Holy Spirit shall give to thousands more a vision for enlarged and more efficient Christian service, through the splendid training awaiting them by enrolling for a Moody Bible Institute Correspondence Course.

8 BIBLE STUDY COURSES

Synthetic Bible Study

—a fascinating study of the contents of the whole Bible, really in a class by itself.

Practical Christian Work

—for soul winners and workers in exceptional forms of Christian service.

Bible Doctrine

—a biblical course in the great doctrines of the Christian faith.

Bible Chapter Summary

—a unique method of becoming acquainted with every chapter in the Bible.

Introductory Bible Course

—true to its name.

Evangelism

—nothing in modern evangelism overlooked.

Christian Evidences

—an old subject brought up to date.

The Scofield Bible

—a scholarly, comprehensive, tested for a quarter of a century, and taken already by ten thousand students.

No matter what your occupation, you can study the Bible by correspondence. One student who has taken several courses is doing all his studying on the street car going back and forth from his place of employment.

Another student says: "I am sure money can never buy the blessings which I have received from taking that course (Scofield). It is certainly a wonderful course. In a week or two I shall enroll in another course. I would like to go through them all."

Another says: "I wish to express my deep appreciation of the Synthetic Course. It has been the means of a marked change in my life. It is truly wonderful."

Trained Bible Students are more and more in demand for Christian service at home and abroad. Whether in the home, church, school or the business world, this training is of inestimable value.

Some Gains in View

Are you tempted to think that you cannot afford the time or the money?

No loss is incurred but great gain from the small outlay required to undertake systematic study of God's Word with the help of such eminent Bible teachers as Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., Rev. C. I. Scofield, D.D., and others who prepared the Institute's Correspondence Courses.

The best of all remedies for doubt concerning the Bible is reverent and systematic study of the Bible.

To fill empty pews with devout worshipers, "fill up" on the Bible and lead the hearers into intelligent, comprehensive knowledge of its marvelous, life-giving, life-sustaining, life-glorifying contents.

To transform an unsatisfactory Christian experience, to change defeat to victory, to mount up where vision is enlarged, the footing sure, capacity for service gloriously increased and the sense of partnership with the Lord Jehovah a daily reality, "STUDY to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed rightly dividing the Word of Truth."

Questions and Answers

L. G., St. Louis, Mo. We pray not to be saved from meeting temptation, but to be strengthened and given power to resist temptation. Jesus Himself was tempted, yet without sin, for He overcame the tempter. The mere suggestion of evil which enters the mind during temptation is a trap of the wicked one; but if we maintain the resistant attitude and pray for strength, the assaults will cease. We are not held accountable for temptation, but for yielding to it, or inviting its repetition.

Mrs. J. E. M., Frankfort, O. There are different degrees of excellence, but in the passage in Matt. 5:48 our Lord indicates the kind of excellence which He desired in His disciples, and to characterize His Kingdom. They were not to be content with striving for any ordinary degree. He pointed them to the Father as the centre and source of all completeness, and urged them to emulate the Divine Model. They (the disciples) must consecrate themselves to lives of holiness, acceptable to God and blameless before men, and this in a very special degree, in order that, the work of the Kingdom might not suffer in their hands.

W. T. F., Minatare, Neb., writes: "The cheapest and what would probably prove the quickest and most satisfactory solution of the disarmament question, of which I have yet heard, is this: Let amendments be enacted and added to the constitutions of the different nations, making it the duty of the king, emperor, czar, president, or whatever the ruler may be termed, to take the first rank on the firing line when the nation goes to war; also one-third of the Parliament or Congress to go to the front—this third to be determined by lot after war has been declared." The suggestion of our correspondent is not absolutely new, but it is interesting, in view of the fact that disarmament is a foremost topic at present.

Mrs. W. J. B., Germantown, Pa., writes: "I was raised on a farm, but having lived in a big city for fourteen years, I now know what life and living mean. In your issue of March 26, you write about the Southern mountaineers. Well, I wonder if those people are not as happy as, if not much happier, than the crowds of idle pleasure-seekers we see on the streets of our cities every day. It seems to me that what our parents taught us (about theatres and shows, etc.) is all coming out too true, especially since moving pictures came into vogue. Good Christian people are using them as a power to assist in the rebuilding of the nations; but I see in them nothing to help the world along. They create excitement in the minds of children and there is very little reality to them. The poor even deny themselves proper food that they may 'take in a show.'"

W. C. McG., Harrison, O. We are told in Scripture to "keep the body under," but this does not mean to neglect hygienic laws. It refers to unholy desires and sinful indulgences. We are also told that the body is to be the temple of the Holy Spirit; hence it is our duty to keep it free from everything of a foul and evil nature; that it may be a fitting temple. Hygienic laws include "temperance in all things," and should be observed as a duty, in order that our bodies may be able to render the service for which they were intended. We know that there are certain fads and cults in connection with body training, but these have little to do with the religious aspect of the question.

Rev. Thos. Harwood, of the Apostolic Faith Mission, Hangchow, China, writes to the Christian Herald asking its readers to send him old picture post-cards, used or unused, the brighter colored the better, for use in his Sunday school.

Old Subscriber, Newark, N. J., writes enclosing a newspaper clipping relative to the external movements of the coastal range of mountains near San Francisco, which scientists state have been moving slowly northward, "causing enormous earth strains and producing movements in one of which Mount Tamalpais jumped back six and six-tenths feet, according to Prof. Lawson of California University." Tamalpais, as geologists declare, moved northward ten feet between the years 1854 and 1906, and then jumped back in the latter year fully six feet. This was at the time of the great California earthquake. Mount Hamilton, near San Jose, is another California height which has a record of moving northward at the rate of four feet a year for ten years, from 1893 to 1903, and subsequently continuing the same movement at a reduced annual rate. Our Newark correspondent recalls the verse in Ps. 114, "The mountains skip like rams," as being appropriate to the subject.

The Forest of Mexican Ignorance

The Second of a Series of Articles on Mexico, Presenting an Appalling Picture of Illiteracy and Lack of Educational Opportunities

By WALLACE THOMPSON

A LAND of innumerable children. A land where there are twice as many children under 10 years old as there are in the United States, in proportion to population. And a land where not one child in six has even the chance to go to school, because there are no schools for them.

The depth of Mexico's ignorance, in childhood and in adulthood, literally passes comprehension. The active, curious minds of the Indian youngsters grow quickly into sodden stupidity; the keen and vivid intelligences of the children of the middle and upper classes expend their growing forces in sensuality and plunge themselves and their country into debilitating excesses—because there is no training to give them a life above the animals.

I have seen, in the seats of government in Mexico, men who know less of world history than a boy in an American high school; I have talked with "experts" of government departments who knew less of their special subjects than did I, a layman. I have seen in the presidential chair men who believed, literally, that the shrunken, sick Mexico of today was one of the great, advanced countries of the world—because they had no conception of the development of world civilization.

I have seen, in Mexican homes, the slow murder of Mexican babies, because neither I nor anyone else could change the round of tradition, unrelieved by training of any sort, which takes an annual toll of child life in Mexico that is perhaps not surpassed even by the toll of the famine in China.

The chain of tradition links Mexico together, and links her, too, to a past that goes back into the furthest reaches of prehistoric legend. The ways of modern agriculture are those of the early Aztecs, and modern tools, even, are introduced with the greatest difficulty. The round of life is a brief cycle of dull days, unlivened by any thought or knowledge beyond the confines of a village or a township or a few blocks of a city. The schools, such as they are, are patterned after models long abandoned everywhere else in the world, and are stifled by a traditional belief that war and revolution and the erection of imposing buildings are more important to the progress of the country than the education of its youth.

All this has driven Mexico on through the years handicapped with a load of illiteracy that can well be recognized as the most potent factor in the degeneration that marks her every manifestation today.

ONLY figures can tell, even in part, the depths of that ignorance. Back in 1895, the Mexican government reports—which one must always remember speak as favorably as they dare—showed that only 2,000,000 out of a population of 12,500,000 could read and write! This means that 82 per cent. of all the people of Mexico were without these rudiments of learning. By 1900, this percentage has been reduced to 80 and in 1910, the Diaz government claimed that it had been reduced to 78; in other words that of the 15,000,000 population of that year, a little over 3,000,000 could read and write, while nearly 12,000,000 remained in the depths of their ignorance. In 1919, the Carranza government issued a report claiming but a slight advance over these figures in the nine years since the fall of Diaz.

It is literally true that not a tenth of all the people in Mexico have what we would call a common-school education, and three out of four cannot read a street sign or scrawl their own names. Indeed, one great British mining company reported that of its 595 Mexican employees, including scores of what we would call skilled workmen, only six, or about one per cent. could sign a receipt for the money they were paid.

To us who look on through foreign eyes, this condition explains much of Mexico's dilemma, and the point is further clarified when we know that the greatest claim ever made for Mexican schools showed but 12,000 school units, with 850,000 pupils enrolled—while there was a school population of children of school age of more than four million! No single issue is greater, no single problem more pressing, than education. And yet, education waits, as everything else in Mexico waits, on peace and better times, on food and on health. And these wait on education! Around and around the problem swings, and each issue is dependent upon another, and that, then, upon the first.

Of all the complicated, interwoven factors of Mexican life and history none, however, stands out so clearly or offers so direct an entrance within this circle of interdependencies, than race. And this is especially true with regard to education. The basis of Mexico's ignorance and the basis of her steel-bound traditions, is Indianism. For Mexico's 15,000,000 people include 6,000,000 pure-blooded Indians, more Indians in manners than the reservation aborigines of the United States. There are 8,000,000 mixed-bloods, half of whom are virtually Indians in their way of life and in their outlook upon the world. And there are only 1,000,000 of white strain, mostly Spanish, a group which is today almost without voice in the affairs of the country.

Two-thirds of Mexico, then, is Indian, and the other third is a mixture of Indian and white, a mass with the dark Indian sea below it and virtually no light coming to it from above.

This is a literal fact, for to-day there sifts into the Mexican ruling classes—these same mixed-bloods—hardly a ray of culture, hardly a gleam of a truly broader outlook, to lift them out of the dull cavern of their circumscribed life. We talk of the heathen of China, of the darkness of ignorance and superstition in Africa, but in Mexico the foreign churches and the foreign industrial concerns seem to me to face a greater need than in any other country in the world.

For Mexico is at our door, and the cultural traditions of Mexico are those of our own world, the white. For 300 years she was a subject state of Spain, and for all the mistakes of the Spaniards and the Roman Catholic Church, the foundation-stones they laid are as the foundation-stones of our own life.

The Indian mass was the great problem of Spain; it was the great problem of Diaz; it is the great problem of today. For the past ten years it has been forgotten,

The active, curious minds of the Indian youngsters quickly grow into sodden stupidity; the keen and vivid intelligences of the children of the middle and upper classes soon expend their growing forces lost in the struggles of individual men for personal power. But always those individuals have been swallowed up in the mire of Indianism, for Indianism, the very epitome of ignorance, lies there always beneath the Mexico that the world sees, waiting to engulf its own masters and to destroy all progress. The Spaniards and Diaz built above these shifting sands, conscious of them, providing against them always. Diaz fell because after he had built his foundations he did not reach down into the Indian mass to upraise them. He fell in his old age, forgetting, as old men forget, the dangers that have been with them through all their life. But before he fell he had laid the foundations, building upon those of the Spaniards and erecting new ones of his own, among them foundations of foreign business, of foreign missions, of foreign schools, business and missions and schools which by their own enterprise and perhaps as much by the examples which they set for Mexican business, Catholic churches and native school teachers, were beginning the great uplift of that vast, inert Indian mass.

ANOTHER disturbing factor in Mexican educational progress has been the long controversy and confusion between politics and religion. In Spanish times all education was in the hands of the Catholic Church, but in that day and indeed well into this, priests and nuns alone had the devotion to attempt the lifting of the terrible burden of ignorance and superstition. In the lights of their day they achieved tremendously, and our criticism of their work is of necessity grounded on our own standards and judged by the events of later generations than those in which they first worked.

But the Catholic Church is indeed to be criticized in its attitude toward the question of education, in particular, after the so-called Mexican "Reform" of 1857. At that time, following a long battle over politics and religion, the Church and the State were separated by government decree, and the schools were taken away from the Catholics and put under federal jurisdiction. The latter was obviously far less fit, at that time at least, than the Church to handle educational problems; but without recognizing the possibilities of development, the Catholics made the schools, as they made much else in Mexico life, a battleground for retaining their fast-slipping control over the politics of the country.

Beginning at that time and continuing well into the era of Diaz, which began in 1876, the Catholics fought bitterly with the "liberals" over education. Much of the backwardness of Mexican teaching was due to the uncompromising attitude of both sides, for the liberals, on their part, opposed anything that smacked of churchly lore in the schools. Religious teaching was rigidly excluded, and even the morals of behavior and what we would call civic training were taboo. The result was the most superficial education imaginable, and this superficiality has continued to this day in the public schools of Mexico. Intimacy and close interest in the lives of pupils who come from homes steeped in ignorance is one of the great opportunities of education in Mexico, and this was made impossible by the limitations of curriculum and the narrowing of educational ideals which went on in Mexico because of the battle between the Catholic Church and the government. Educated men—and the Catholics still controlled the education of the best Mexicans—were eliminated from participation in education because they were Catholics, the stream of assistance that might have come from religious aid and religious idealism was shut off. The entire processes of education was warped by the personal battles of Mexican politicians, inside the Church and outside it.

It was at this point, some forty years ago, that the first Protestant missions were established in Mexico. Education had been going along at the best pace it could, with the Church still in actual, if not in official control, of all the education that was even remotely worth the name. The Church was also in control of religion, for the "Reform" in Mexico was accomplished without the substitution of Protestantism for Catholicism, or even the introduction of Protestantism.

The effect of those pioneer missions on education and on religion as well, is something that we can not measure. All that we know is that the Catholics made bitter attacks on the Protestants, and that the government welcomed the Protestant missions with open favoritism. Their schools followed the establishment of their

A group of sturdy youngsters from the kindergarten class of a girls' mission school at Puebla. Three out of four of the people of Mexico fall short of the educational attainments of these toddlers churches and where religion was rigidly excluded from even the recognized Catholic schools taught by nuns, it was allowed in the Protestant schools. Thus the Protestant high schools became normal schools for the training of Protestant Christian teachers, and thus note a parallel between the mission schools and the painfully slow advance of Mexican education, we have, in justice, to add the sorry story of education under the Carranza régime. Then, with the pressure of the needs of the revolutionary "generals" for greater and greater appropriations for their armies—and for the graft which ate up most of such appropriations—with the ever widening circle of vampires who fattened on government patronage in every other conceivable way, the money available for education shrunk steadily. Where under Diaz the total annual budget of the government was $50,000,000 a year, with the total appropriations for schools, federal and state, probably less than $4,000,000, Carranza had in all nearer $100,000,000 and spent less than $2,000,000 a year on education. For Carranza, when the demands of his generals for their "share" increased, shut off the government support of the schools of the City of Mexico and its neighboring villages and also the sums which had in other days gone to help the poorly provided state governments. He threw the school systems on the hands of absolutely bankrupt cities and towns, with the result that in the city of Mexico alone, some 120 schools, half the former number, were closed, and 25,000 children, despite the crowding of other schools, were deprived of education. All this is history. Statistics do not show that there has been any recovery today, but the benefit of the doubt must be allowed the new Mexican governments.

NOW, under Carranza there were working, as educational officials as well as teachers, a very great number of men who had been trained in Protestant schools and seminaries. Upon these men I cast no discredit, for they were helpless, victimized by the prostitution of their own ideals by Carranza and his minions. They had carried their knowledge of Mexico and of Mexican affairs into the heart of the revolution—they were part of that company of supporters of Madero, of whom so much of good is to be said. They believed in Carranza's contention that he was carrying the torch of Madero—and because they believed they stood beside him, and took, unflinchingly, the odium of his failure and his wicked cynicism.

With one of the greatest of these Protestant teachers I talked in Mexico City last winter. Andres Osuna, a Southern Methodist, a graduate and post-graduate of Vanderbilt University, had much to do with the educational programs of Carranza. He brought to them a clear vision of their needs and a deep understanding of their difficulties. He laid out a long, slow scheme of development, but he was not allowed to remain in Mexico City to carry it out, or even to begin it. He was sent off to greater honors, as governor of the State of Tamaulipas. I do not believe that he will object to my recording that it was he whom I had in mind when I wrote, in my previous article, of the men whose "very hopes were too great to protect them from the petty deceits of those who climbed to power upon them."

Governor Osuna is one of those who today is almost hopeless of a solution of the educational problem of Mexico. Continued on page 344

These children are fortunate, for a mission school gives them a chance for an education. The greatest claim ever made for the Mexican schools showed only 850,000 enrolled out of more than 4,000,000 children of school age

The Boy Problem Walks in Again

I THOUGHT when the Boy's first love affair was settled satisfactorily to his mother that my problems, so far as he was concerned, were over for a while. But it seems that they were only just begun.

I had settled down to my detective stories again, and was getting to the point where the blood stain on the library rug was found to be only some red raspberry jam spilled there by one of the children in the haunted house, when one evening, just as I had picked up the story to go on from that point, the Boy came down from his room with a pile of books under his arm. His mother was upstairs and the other Boy and the Girl were out somewhere. I looked up from my book and said, "Going to the library?" (He had been going up there to use reference books and this was one of his nights.)

"Yes, but I wonder if you have time to answer a question?"

At first I felt irritated, anticipating some puzzle or other in philosophy or psychology, in which realms I don't come out very strong; but the Boy had a real look of anxiety on his face and I said, "Sure. Sit down. Let's have it."

He looked at me a little doubtfully (I suppose my invitation hadn't been very hearty), but he sat down and looked so wistful and troubled that I began to feel some uneasy, and I closed my book and laid it down on the table.

"It's about John," he said rather vaguely.

"John? John who?"

"The Gospel of John."

"Yes? Well—go on. What about it?"

"Doctor Strong (he is the Boy's teacher in Sociology) says that John's Gospel was never written by John, and that whoever did write it has not given us a true picture of Jesus. And he says—"

"Hold on. Let me get this straight. Do you mean that one of your teachers in the college is teaching his class that one of the Gospel writers has given us an untrue story of Jesus?"

THE Boy looked at me as if he pitied my ignorance.

"Sure. It's the modern way of studying the Bible. But the thing that is puzzling me right now is that what Professor Strong says is contradicted by our minister. Last Sunday morning you were not at church."

(I remembered at that point that I had stayed at home to polish up my golf sticks and finish the morning paper. I don't often do that, but once in a while I get so nervous over my business that I can't go to church, and a lot of other church members in our town are getting in the same way.)

"Yes, I remember. Well—go on."

"And in his sermon he said that there was a controversy going on over the authorship of John's Gospel, and he wanted to set some things right. And then he went on to contradict some of the very points that the professor made to us in denying John's authorship and his picture of Jesus, which the professor says does not agree with Matthew or Luke or Mark."

"Well?" I said as the Boy paused.

"The thing that troubles me is which one of these two to believe. Dr. Wright" (that is our minister's name) "is a good scholar and a very careful student, and our professor is a graduate of one of the great German universities, and has written a lot of books. Which one of these two men shall I believe when they contradict each other?"

"Why?"—I started to answer the Boy, and then I found I really did not know what to say. I am only a mere man, and I never had a chance to go to college, and my business is very pressing and I never paid any attention to theological or Biblical discussions. I have the greatest respect for all scholars, and our minister is a man I had always trusted to say the right thing; and when he pronounces words in the pulpit different from the way we do it at home, I let it go without question, as I knew he had looked it up in the dictionary and I hadn't. But the question the Boy put to me now was one I didn't feel qualified to answer off the brain at once. So I said again, "Why?" and stopped there.

"Well," said the Boy, "which one of these men am I going to believe?" If John did not write John's Gospel, who did write it? If his story of Jesus is not true, how can I believe what the other Gospels say about Jesus? Professor Strong says modern scholarship takes the view that John's Gospel cannot be depended on to tell us the real character of Jesus. But Dr. Wright last Sunday said that some of the best scholars in this country and in Europe defend John's Gospel as being the spiritual outline of Jesus' character."

I could see that the matter was really

Another Delightful Discussion of a Question Which Might Arise in Your Home

By A MERE MAN

troubling the Boy, and I could also see that I did not have the right answer for his question, because I did not know enough about all the discussion that was going on. So I said to him:

"You have got me going on a subject that I shall have to post up on. Give me a little time. Meanwhile, don't throw away your faith in the Gospel of John just because a man who has graduated from a German university tells you certain things. All the truth is not wrapped up in one set of brains. Hold on to the old Gospel and don't make a snap judgment."

THE Boy went away up to the Library, with a curious look in his eye that I interpreted as somewhat more or less of distrust of his Dad's ability to tackle the subject. But he looked also somewhat relieved, as if the matter was not all one-sided.

Now, I may as well say that while I am a mere man, and have been engrossed in business because I have had to earn a decent living for my family, I have always considered my brains as fairly well built to understand every-day affairs, even if they do not come under the head of dollars. So I set myself to find a reasonable answer to the Boy's problem, without too much fear of college professors or of German universities.

The first thing I did was to get from our minister a list of the best books about John's Gospel. He was greatly pleased to lend me all he had, and gave me a list that happened to be in our town library. I set myself to read up on the history of the Gospel, and before I knew it, I found that detective stories are not in it with the wonderful story that John tells. I soon found out the secret of skipping in the right places, and I believe I really got down to the meat of the subject after carving away some of the big bones, and then I went to our minister and had a good long conference with him.

And do you know that, right here, I found one of the most satisfactory experiences of my life? I found that a real study of the Gospels was as interesting as making money. Our minister laid himself out to help me. And I added several degrees to my respect for him as a scholar and a gentleman.

I want to say right here also, that as I went on, I kept reproaching myself that I had not kept more in touch with the Boy's studies in College. I had been so busy making money that I really did not know, when he came to me with that question, whether he was taking a course in Astronomy or Bookkeeping. The whole thing which he had opened up made me ashamed to think that I had turned him loose in the pastures of knowledge without ever knowing whether it grew more thistles or weeds than grass. Only if it had been an old horse or a cow, I would have gone out to the pasture once in a while to see how it looked. So I asked the Boy, one day when I was getting pretty near through the evidence on the minister's side, if it would be possible for me to come into the Professor's class-room and hear what he had to say.

The Boy was a little doubtful, as visitors in college classes were rare. He couldn't remember when any of the fellows' fathers or mothers had ever been into the college, except when the fellows were graduated, and they saw the finished product. But after a little hesitation, he finally said that there was no rule against visitors that he knew of, so one day I went in with the class (took half a day off from business to do it), and I happened at an hour when the professor was going over a review of his arguments on the John matter.

He did not notice me, as the class is a large one and I sat in a back seat, and he is short-sighted, and absent-minded; and I sat there and heard him pull John's Gospel to pieces, without putting it together again. But when the class was dismissed, I went up and introduced myself.

He came out of his absent-mindedness and seemed to be a little confused. I came point-blank to the subject, which is a habit in our family, and asked a few questions, quoting our minister quite liberally. The professor, I am sorry to say, got quite angry at some statements the minister made, as I quoted them. He said the statements were not warranted by the best scholarship. I have a pretty good memory, and I quoted a list of writers I had received from the minister who contradicted the professor, and said that John's Gospel was authentic history. And at that point he refused to discuss any farther, saying he had another class, and I came away.

BUT a few evenings later, when the Boy came in from the Library quite late, and I was alone in the sitting-room, I ventured to ask him if he had settled the matter of John's Gospel and the conflicting authorities about it.

"No, I haven't. Honestly, Father," he said, "I don't see how the two views can be reconciled!"

"Then where is your mind going to rest?"

"I don't think it will. I'll just hang the matter up in the air and leave it unsettled."

"But that is not the way to treat a matter of such importance as this. It is either the act of a coward or a slack and lazy mind."

"Well," the Boy said, somewhat doggedly, "what shall I do? Believe my professor or my minister?"

"Believe the one who presents the best evidence. Why should you believe the teaching of a professor who has filled his mind with German philosophy and higher criticism, and throw away the teaching of a minister who has gone into this matter with just as much keenness of mind and scholarship? After looking into the whole business and having long talks with our minister, I am convinced that John's Gospel contains as true a picture of Jesus as Matthew's or Mark's or Luke's Gospel. Each writer saw the Jesus that impressed him. Each writer has given the world the picture of the Master that appealed to his own heart and mind. If four men wrote the life of Abraham Lincoln, you would have four different looks at him, and each one would be true. And when it comes to scholarly authorities for the truth of John's Gospel—"

At this point I reeled off a list of names that made the Boy's eyes open. I think he had an idea that his Dad was such a mere money-maker that he hadn't brains for anything else. And I think from that time on he looked with more or less added respect over the dinner-table at me.

IT WAS late when he went upstairs to his room that night, and he seemed more satisfied in his mind than I thought perhaps he would be. And may I say right here that the whole incident opened my eyes, not only to the Boy's problem, but to my own. I have taken to reading my New Testament lately, and I don't miss the detective stories so very much.

The Boy's attitude toward the questions which had been raised was not settled finally by our conversation, but I think I really helped him along the right track. He is still wrestling over his philosophy and his theology, and he will have to work it out for himself if the answer is going to become a part of his own convictions and exercise a real influence on his life. All the fathers in the world can't do his thinking for him, which is a good thing for him and saves much wear for a father. But he is honestly and sincerely working toward the answer, not dodging the issue and I'm sure he will come out all right.

The other day, the Boy came in with another Problem. It seems he is beginning to think that perhaps his Dad does know a little even along his line of goods. But this new Problem is really so great and serious that I haven't time to tell you about it this time. Some other time.

The Bible

1. The best book in the world; the best to sell; the best to buy.
2. The Bible has the best vocabulary known to the English language.
3. It has more quotable sayings than any other book.
4. It deals with every phase of human experience. Although ancient in its authorship it is modern in its application.
5. Coleridge said he loved the Bible "because it found him."
6. Do not be afraid of new editions of the Bible. Many of them throw new light on old passages. "The New Testament in Modern Speech" will help make vivid "the old, old story."
7. The Bible is a progressive revelation of the growth of the human soul. It begins in the Garden of Eden. It ends in the Garden of Gethsemane.
8. Obedience to Bible teachings will put an end to war, disease, poverty, crime and sin. Of what other book in the world can this be said?

A Pleasing Five-Part Story

Part Two

CHAPTER IV

WHILE Ruth stood staring irresolutely, the tray in her hands, bewildered at her reception, the man arose—a huge figure of a man, bearded and with coal-black locks falling down to his eyes, which were shaded by the great spectacles—a fearsome figure, truly. And he peremptorily slammed the door in her face.

"Well," exclaimed the bewildered girl, "if that's Tom Auld, I can't imagine him working for Donaldson!"

Just then a voice called from another room, a central room, Ruth perceived. "Come in here, please. That's Mr. Blair's private room, and he don't want anybody interruptin' him when he get's a-goin'."

It was a sweet, thin voice, evidently that of an elderly woman. Ruth hastened to enter the room from whence it came, and found a placid, sweet-faced woman of enormous girth, sitting in a wheel-chair, the knitting-needles held in her hands, showing that they, at least, were not paralyzed.

The woman sat by an open window, looking out upon a field where a man was plowing some feeble corn. It was a neat room, and quite comfortable; there was a rug under the woman's feet, and a big cat lay comfortably upon it; there was a red fuchsia in full bloom on the window-sill, and a table at her elbow held a pitcher of water and a glass.

"You are Mrs. Auld, I am sure," said Ruth, with her sweetest smile; "and I am Ruth Carfax, your new neighbor, come to live at the old Carfax place. I've come to see you, and I've taken the liberty to bring you some of my jelly and some little cup-custards."

She swept off the napkin, disclosing the tempting, quivering mould of amber jelly topped by thick, whipped cream and dotted with preserved cherries, and a cup of delicate custard, accompanied by some brown, thin little cookies.

It was a tempting tray, but the eyes of the paralytic rested, not upon it, but upon the bearer. Her eyes, dim behind their glasses, searched the girl's face eagerly, while her lips quivered. "Child," quavered Nancy Auld, "you are the image of your grandma Carfax, when she was a girl! Ruth Saulsberry she was, and she taught my class in Sunday school, when I was little. I thought Miss Ruth was surely like the angels in Heaven, she was so sweet!"

RUTH placed the tray on the table beside the chair, then she leaned over and kissed Nancy Auld. "That doesn't mean, Mrs. Auld," she laughed, with tears brimming her lashes, "that I'm like an angel, I hope; for I'm sorry to know you'll be disappointed in me if you imagine that!"

Nancy Auld smiled, and there were dimples in her placid cheeks, making her look positively girlish though she must have been at least on the shady side of fifty. "Well, I don't want you to be an angel, yet awhile, Miss Ruth," she laughed, eying the tray appreciatively. "Dear, dear, how nice it does look! I've got nobody to do for me but my boy Tom, and he's too busy to cook up many things, if he knowed how—and if we had the things to make 'em out of. Honey, you are mighty kind to fetch me over such a nice tray, and I thank you so much, but if you knew how lonesome I get, you'd know that your company was even better. Sit down in that rocker, where I can look right at you, and see your grandma's favor. There—move over Blackie," to the cat, who slumbered at her feet, "so's the young lady can have more room."

Ruth, a bit embarrassed at Mrs. Auld's frank scrutiny, picked up the big, satiny black fellow and held him on her lap. "I have a kitten and a puppy that Mrs. Abner Green gave me," she said, "and they are so much company for me, and for Ellen Hawtree, my help. As soon as the men get through with the work they are doing at the house, she and I will come and wheel you over to spend the day."

"Listen to that!" breathed Mrs. Auld, dimpling with delight. "Not," she added, hastily, "that the neighbors ain't kind, and more, but to spend the day! Why, I ain't been out of the house in twelve years, child, think of it—twelve long, long years!"

"Then it's high time you were getting out," nodded Ruth, with emphasis. "But tell me," she hastened, for tears were clouding Mrs. Auld's glasses, "who the wild man is in the door at the end of the porch? He fairly shooed me away—I was frightened, truly. He is a terrible looking man."

"And wouldn't hurt a flea, not he," said Nancy Auld, shaking her head sadly; "it's just his way, when he gets a-goin'. He's our lodger, and does for himself, poor fellow!"

"I like Mrs. Auld's name for you, Comfort-Bringer," he said with a smile. "I wish you could bring me a little, for my book is about finished and I need comforting."

"But what is it he does, when he gets a-going," queried Ruth, "that he should insult harmless and innocent visitors?"

MRS. AULD hitched her chair a bit nearer, a sparkle was in her eyes, and a thrill in her voice. "He's writin' a book!" she said, with a touch almost of reverence.

"What?" echoed Ruth, in tones of respect, "a novel, or something like that?"

"Yes, a novel; and it's been in his head for years and years, only there were a lot of brothers and a sister

How the Story Began

RUTH CARFAX is brought up by her grandfather, a wonderful companion, after all the others of her family are lost in a sea disaster when she is ten. Her early memories are of a life of luxury and wealth, but in her grandfather's big, dark house in the city all is simplicity and plainness and their fondest dream is of a return to the quaint little country house in which he had begun his married life. As Ruth is finishing college her grandfather dies, but she determines to carry out their plans and, accompanied by Mr. Gary, the family lawyer, she goes to the farm, which is managed by Donaldson, a man of miserly disposition. Entering the home of an invalid neighbor, Nancy Auld, several days later, she is driven out by a gaunt, wild-eyed and unkempt figure of a man.

to raise, and him to depend on for the bread that went in their mouths. So, soon's they were all through college, the boys with jobs and the girl married, he found for the first time in his life that he had time to write out his book on paper. And the way he happened to have it, he got down with a spell of fever from overwork—doin' night work to help buy that sister her weddin' clothes, for he didn't want her to go to his folks lookin' as if her folks couldn't do the right thing by her. Then, when he got better, the house he works for told him to take a whole summer off, on half pay. And he come right here a month ago, and does for himself and writes out his book."

Mrs. Auld ended this long explanation rather breathlessly, afraid that she might leave out something, in the telling.

"Well, he needn't fly at people and slam the door in their faces, if he can write a book," returned Ruth, indignantly. "But," she added, "I am sorry for him all the same; he looked, as well as I could see, hungry, too."

"Does for himself," nodded Mrs. Auld, "and you know how men folks are, even my Tom, that I taught myself. He told Tom, just yesterday, to try and get Sary Bryson, who chores out, to do for him—but she must wait till he's out, afternoons. I lay he thought you was Sary!"

"Then I'll forgive him," laughed Ruth, "though I wonder if I do look like a woman who 'chores out'? Not very flattering to one's self-esteem, is it?"

"Oh, but he's nigh about blind with them specs on," explained Mrs. Auld; "they're for near-seein', till his eyes get strong."

JUST then there entered, from the kitchen door, which opened into Mrs. Auld's chamber, a young man with a gentle face and appealing blue eyes that made one, Ruth thought, want to mother him—a boyish face, irresolute and a bit weak, maybe, but thoroughly good.

"My boy, Tom," said his mother, a thrill of pride and love in her sweet old voice; "and this is Miss Ruth Carfax, son, that's come to live at the old place."

"Mr. Donaldson told me," said the boy, shyly. He lifted his cap, but did not offer to shake hands till Ruth held out her own. She squeezed Tom's hand, shamelessly; Ruth felt an impulse to be kind to him, and to show that she felt that way.

He blushed a little, murmuring that his hands were grubby because he had been digging up stumps.

"Why, I thought you were plowing," wondered Ruth. "I saw you through the window."

"Yes'm, a little; but I been helpin' Mr. Donaldson, mainly this morning."

"Did Mr. Donaldson tell you that this is his last crop on my farm? That I will pay him wages next year?" asked Ruth, and noted the pallor creep into his ruddy cheeks.

"I—I didn't know," he stammered. "I hope, Miss Ruth, you'll let me help with the farm work, right on."

"Surely," agreed Ruth, heartily, "and at good wages, too. I'll ask Mr. Green what that will be—not Mr. Donaldson, for he might want to save me all he can, you know." She laughed, and Nancy Auld laughed, but a little bitterly.

"There's such a thing as bein' too savin', Miss Ruth; and my boy and me, we thank you, kindly."

"He's just, Mr. Donaldson is," spoke Tom, anxiously; "mustn't get it that he ain't a just man, and won't treat you right about your place, ma'am."

"There's such a thing as being merciful as well as just," murmured Nancy Auld, but her son spoke up hastily:

"Sary Bryson can't come afternoons, Mother; she's had to go to her sister, who's sick over in the village."

"That poor David Blair!" pitied Nancy Auld; "he's gettin' thinner and thinner, what with writing like fury and not takin' time to eat, much less to cook—except make strong coffee."

"Listen," said Ruth, with sparkling eyes, "let me do for him. And he'll never know the difference; he'll think I'm Sary! Only this must be kept a dead, dead secret between us three. I would not want him or anybody else to find it out."

TOM protested, and Mrs. Auld protested, but Ruth overruled their objections. It was decided that, each afternoon when the writer of the book was out walking, as the doctors had ordered, she would slip over and "redd" his apartment and cook up a bite, as he had expected Sary Bryson to do.

"Just don't mention Sary, and I'll run over this afternoon," she told them; "and now, Mrs. Auld and Tom, remember that you are my neighbors, and you must let me be neighborly, as my dear old grandfather would have wished me to be. You'll promise, for his sake?"

Tom Auld nodded; the lump in his throat hurt him too much to speak distinctly, and his mother, speaking softly, said:

"Honey, do you see that picture over the bed? I look at it night and mornin', and wonder if there are folks really like that. You are like that girl in the picture, Ruthie!"

The picture was an old-fashioned steel engraving of a girl with a basket on her arm entering a cottage door; through the open door could be seen an old woman in an armchair beside the hearth, while a cat reposed at her feet. The title of the picture was "The Comfort-Bringer."

"And hereafter," continued Mrs. Auld, happily, "you'll always mean that to me—" "The Comfort-Bringer."

"That's a beautiful name, and I mean to be just that to you, to all of my neighbors who'll let me," answered Ruth, softly, as she kissed Nancy Auld on her cheek, waved her hand, with a smile, to Tom, and left the cottage. Ruth was beginning to be embarrassed, poor Nancy Auld was so profuse in her praises.

"The Comfort-Bringer," mused Ruth, as she walked swiftly toward her own home. "Dear Grandfather, you'd be glad to know anybody thought of your little Heart's Comfort as that, wouldn't you?"

CHAPTER V

RUTH returned to Nancy's cottage that afternoon, when the lodger who "did for" himself was out; she cleaned the little room and tiny kitchen, with a small oil-stove for equipment. She did things that were magical with this cooking-apparatus: For instance, it produced a crisp apple-pie, though there was no oven; it turned out a crock of tempting doughnuts, and a loaf of sweet bread; it roasted a chicken—"you can tell him Sary sells her hens cheap," laughed Ruth to Nancy Auld, who viewed the arrangements happily, "and that he won't have to pay until her work is ended."

But the one thing she did not do was to touch the man's precious typewriter and his more precious manuscript, which was held down firmly with an empty bottle as paper-weight. Ruth had a respectful awe for literature and the maker of such; her mind was distinctly domestic, and to write a book seemed to her a gigantic task savoring of magic—to write those messy looking sheets was marvelous, but Ruth had small desire to read them, so she let them strictly alone.

Nancy Auld basked in the sunshine of her neighbor's ministrations as well as the book-writer, who waxed strong on the good cooking the supposed Sary left behind her on certain stated days.

"He says his book is fair running away with him," beamed Nancy, on one of the occasions when the chore-woman came, bearing gifts, "and me—honey, I'm just another woman since you came! And it ain't the good things you fetch me, either, it's just the comfort you bring along with you."

Ruth glowed; to be a comfort-bringer was indeed a wonderful thing. "I love you for that, Nancy Auld!" she laughed. "I know I am not clever, or beautiful, or anything that most girls crave to be; so I want to be more than anything in all the world, a 'comfort-bringer' to folks who need comfort. I guess I was just made to 'do for' people, Nancy, because I love it so."

Ruth's days were indeed busy ones, now; carpenters, plumbers and painters were making new the interior of the little brown house. The outside she would not touch, much to the amazement of the workmen, who argued for a new coat of paint, to match the spotless walls within.

"I want it brown, and weathered, and friendly," she declared, "just such a house as will match the hawthorn hedge that Mr. Donaldson is planting—and the beds of 'violets.' No—my house is perfect without—it sha'n't be touched."

DONALDSON, planting hawthorn and wild roses and violets, viewed them with scorn, as things that would yield not one cent in cash for the outlay expended to produce them.

"But think of the pleasure they will give," argued Ruth, to his protests, "not only to us, but to passers-by. Beauty has its uses, or God wouldn't have made flowers, Mr. Donaldson."

"Oh, aye, if ye say so, mem," said Donaldson, dourly, "but it's better to grow what ye can pit in your purse in the end, I'm thinkin'. Still, ye're mistress here, and I'm your hired man, to do yer will. If 'twas left to me, I'd be stickin' out inguns and cabbages, not weeds and blooms."

The crops on the place were Ruth's, bought by Mr. Gary, who had negotiated with Donaldson. "The old rascal drove a mighty hard bargain, and I don't mind telling you there won't be a cent of profit for you, my dear," Mr. Gary had said; "but you will want to be making apple-butter, and preserves, and canning peaches and vegetables; this year won't matter so much, and the next we can do as we please."

Miss Emily David, the little school mistress, used

Mother's Day

By Margaret E. Sangster

NEVER too busy, she was, to hear
The little doubt or the little fear;
Never too busy to set aright
The dreams that haunted the darksome night.
Never too busy to read a book
Of fairy-tales, in some hidden nook.
Never too busy to kiss or praise,
Never too busy to fill our days
With the faith that lives and the joys that start
From the brimming depths of a mother heart!

Mother's Day? Why, they all belong
To the one who murmured our cradle song,
To the one who rocked us upon her breast,
Who gave us cheer, and who brought us rest—
Mother's Day! They are warm pearls strung
On the chain of years, they are anthems sung
By the twilight breeze in the tallest tree,
They are understanding—and mystery.

Never too busy, she was, to give
The love that will always grow and live—
And we who have taken her gifts must know
That they make a part of a debt we owe,
A debt of hope when the way is hard,
Of cheer when the soul seems battle-scarred,
Of letters sent to a lonely place,
Of smiles to brighten a tired face—
Never too tired to kiss or praise.
Mother's Day? They are all her days!

to come over and help Ruth with the canning. Miss Emily was a regular story-book character, who lived alone in a tiny cottage in the village, who had taught the district school for many years, and who always lived in terror of a letter from the trustees notifying her that her services would no longer be needed. Only pity had kept them from such an act, for Miss Emily was growing old, and her methods were obsolete; also rheumatism, caused from scant warmth and scant food, was rapidly disabling the poor little body, with the coming of each succeeding winter growing worse.

"If I possessed the magic wand of great wealth, my dear," Miss Emily would say, happily, as she sat on the back porch of Hideaway House and peeled fruit, "I would love to live in a favored clime where one has always fruit to eat. Grapes and oranges—just imagine having all the grapes and oranges one wants!"

"California, or Florida, Miss Emily?" Ruth would say, loving to hear her visitor descant on her favorite subject.

"The Bermudas," Miss Emily would reply promptly. "I went there once, when I was a little girl, with my Aunt Hester, when my family still owned Our Old Home."—Miss Emily always spoke these words respectfully, and with unmistakable capitals—"and I have never forgotten the oranges, the big grapes and the fields of lilies, raised for market."

Mrs. Abner Green, who was usually present, would add to these reminiscences: "But you'd buy back your Old Home, first, wouldn't you, Miss Emily?"

Ruth had often seen Miss Emily's old home—a big, barnlike house on a bare hillside, tenanted by bats and owls. It was the property of some one who lived in a distant city, and who had long ago abandoned it. Miss Emily's old home could probably have been bought for a song, as the neighbors expressed it.

"Surely," Miss Emily would say, with glowing eyes, "that first of all, as a sacred duty; I would furnish it from memory, and add a few touches to make it as comfortable as this darling cottage. Just think of a furnace in winter!" She shivered enjoyably, though the late summer sun was shining warmly. "Wouldn't it be perfectly grand to have all the heat one wants in winter?" queried poor Miss Emily, thinking of her cold hearthstone in that dread season.

She would babble on, happily, till Ruth would nod to Ellen Hawtree, who would disappear and return soon bearing a tray filled with little cakes or crisp tarts, with cups of steaming tea or tall glasses of iced drinks. These Miss Emily would partake of with keen enjoyment, but she never remained for a meal—she had no way of returning the favor, and she would gratefully but firmly decline all such invitations. Except when Ruth, having her house at last completely turned over by the plumbers and painters, and gentlemen of that ilk, gave a party—a house-warming to which all of her neighbors were invited. To this Miss Emily, who was a thoroughbred little gentlewoman, came as a matter of course. She would not hurt her neighbor by refusing such an invitation to a party which was to be a public function.

NANCY AULD came, propelled over in her chair by Tom, in his Sunday best suit, and by the book writer!

A very different man he seemed to the startled Ruth—who had not invited him, never dreaming for a minute that he would come—from the glowering, spectacled and bearded individual who had slammed the door in her face. Tall and clean-shaven was this man, with clear honest gray eyes that were good to look into, and a mouth that smiled in a whimsical way that made one want to smile back. All this, and yet—the man she had "done for"!

"Mr. Blair, honey—our lodger," introduced Nancy, eagerly. "I told him I knowed you'd be tickled to see him, even if he wasn't invited special—I invited him, myself!"

"Mrs. Auld is all to blame," offered the lodger, gravely, as he took his amazed hostess's hand. "She wants me to meet folks, now that she isn't ashamed of me, since I've shaved and left off my glasses; also had a haircut. She's been mighty good to me, Miss Carfax, and I hope you'll forgive her. You see, she has been telling me such beautiful things about you, that I had to come and see for myself the 'Comfort-Bringer' whom I have never been lucky enough to get a glimpse of before."

His voice was wonderful—like deep music. And the look in his eyes told plainly that he approved of Mrs. Auld's friend. Ruth felt the blood warming her face at thought of the many times she had secretly been his chore-woman!

"He is getting some flesh on his bones," she thought, delightedly, "and how that hair-cut and shave improve his looks—and the absence of those spectacles. He's young—and—handsome!"

All these thoughts she kept to herself; to him she was frank and cordial, pleased to see the friend of her neighbors, assuring him he had, as the Irish would say, a hundred thousand welcomes to Hideaway House, which she hoped he would like.

Mr. Abner Green, as an old friend of her grandfather's, took upon himself the office of master of ceremonies to the masculine guests, though Mr. Gary was present, having run up from the city, leaving his younger partner to look after the affairs of the office. Mr. Green who had personally given the workmen reams of advice, assumed the undisputed rôle of guide as well as sponsor.

Old Jacob Smithers and his family were there; Ruth had really formed an attachment for Mary, the eldest, and the object of Tom Auld's hopeless love. Mary was a fair, tall girl, with frightened blue eyes and flaxen hair that curled bewitchingly about her pale, rather thin face. Ruth saw Donaldson looking at Mary with curious intendment, and finally walk over to the corner where she sat and begin a conversation in a carefully smooth voice, with a smile wrinkling his visage in an alarming manner.

The "Big Brother" and the League

FOR an organization which repeatedly has been declared defunct, the League of Nations manages to keep alive and at its work with extraordinary persistence. Its summer program, which has just been outlined, includes the election of Judges for the International Arbitration Court, the preparation of mandates affecting the interests of some 13,000,000 of "backward peoples" in the Balkans, Mesopotamia and the South Pacific Islands; the adjustment of the dispute concerning the mandate over Yap being likewise on the agenda. The League will also set in motion the work of the Disarmament Commission, of which ex-Premiers Viviani of France and Orlando of Italy are the leading members. It will make an effort to secure the ratification by all the leading governments of the Treaty of St. Germain, which was designed to prevent the dumping among the small, remote nations of the enormous stocks of unused war material left in the belligerent countries. Still another item on the program is the reception of the report of the Committee on Amendments to the League Covenant, including the Canadian amendment to exclude Article X. It will also take up an International Credit plan for extending credits through the League to nations endeavoring to restore economic conditions.

All of the foregoing—and they are only part of the whole program—happen to be items in the settlement of which the United States is deeply interested. We want recognition of our rights in the disposition of Yap, for which Japan is also a claimant. We strongly favor, as a nation, any acceptable plan by which disarmament, or reduction of land and naval forces by the leading powers, can be attained. And this we desire not only on moral ground, but as an economic desideratum, in bringing about a reduction of the oppressive burden of taxation which competitive armament involves. And after all the criticisms we have applied to the League Covenant, it would be singularly ungracious were we to ignore the fact that the Covenant, which was originally an American production, is ready to be resubmitted, with substantially all the changes for which we contended, generously conceded.

Divided counsels have kept us out of the League. Yet the outlook for an understanding which will secure to the United States an advisory voice in all matters before the League in which we have a direct interest, may be ultimately reached, even though we remain aloof from Covenant obligations. There is nothing suggested to indicate that our purpose as a government of retaining the utmost freedom of action on all problems that may give promise of possible entanglements will be called in question.

One thing is palpably certain: the League of Nations is very much alive, and if it should prove equal to the tasks outlined in its summer program, it will deserve to go right on living and working for the world's peace and betterment. We can be the Big Brother and help them with our smile of encouragement, even if we do not take an active hand in the work. Surely some way can be found by which it may be made possible for the United States to keep helpfully in touch with this work whenever opportunity arises, even sharing in its councils as founder and advisor. Thus we would retain the good-will and sincere respect of the nations without sacrifice of fundamental rights or traditions and without any danger of contracting obligations we may choose to avoid.

An Eminent Critic

WHEN James Bryce wrote his famous book, "The American Commonwealth," he was deservedly accorded high consideration by the thoughtful minds of this nation, as one of the few authors of foreign birth who viewed conditions, social, political and economic, from the true angle of an impartial, just and capable observer. In his latest work, "Modern Democracies," published by the Macmillan Company, he treats of condition and peoples in the great democracies of the globe—France, Brazil, Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland, Canada, Mexico, and the United States. His criticisms and valuations are the result of an extensive tour, during which he studied not political conditions alone, but all that most closely relates to governmental methods, courts of justice, elections, the land question, local self-government, and the "tone of public life," contrasting the latter with the tone that prevails in other lands, monarchies included.

His book is really such a series of impressions as none but a man of wide scholarship and experience could possibly have written; and the whole record is so mellowed with the spirit of good humor and fairness, that it is a source of pleasure to the reader. We feel that he is giving us a simple and truthful account of his travels, and in a style so packed full of real worth that the two volumes may almost be read as a continuous narrative. They are not to be regarded as historical, but rather as a friendly observer's presentation of conditions today.

Naturally, the American reader—and there will be many of this class, we feel sure—will turn to that part of the record giving the author's impressions of our own people and institutions. Viscount Bryce does not hesitate here. He is strong in facts and emphasizes them. He tells us that he has found a new spirit awakened in our land, since writing his former book thirty years ago. He notes that the spoils system has almost gone. Civil service has made notable progress, and the calibre of our government employees has palpably improved. We have made wonderful advances in science on many lines. He points out, however, that we still labor under the old evil of "the law's delay," and he hints that the judiciary in some states is hardly respected and in a few almost distrusted. He tells us that our machinery of justice is hampered in many states by ill-drawn and incongruous codes of procedure, some of them absurdly technical and antiquated.

Yet there are many things that offset these defects. Looming large in importance is his discovery that corruption in every form is unsparingly exposed. "Public opinion," he finds to be the real ruler of America. "It is a real force, impalpable as the wind, yet a force which all are trying to discover and nearly all to obey."

His observations in other lands are stated with equal frankness, the good and bad being set in contrast. Of each of the democracies visited he has something of interest to write—here a helpful hint, and there a deserved if rather blunt criticism. All is expressed in the spirit of kindness and with a pen of friendliness of which there can be no doubt.

Industrial Joy

PARDON me; but what did you say?
Industrial Joy.

Never heard of it. We are familiar with "Industrial Unrest," "Industrial Warfare," "Industrial Strife," "Industrial Strikes," "Industrial Problems," but we have never heard of "Industrial Joy." Where did you say it was?

It does not exist. The editor is using it because he is tired of the other kinds of industry. And just for the pleasure of exercising his imagination he is trying to suppose a condition which the wage workers of the world know very little about. In the midst of all the warfare and demands and unrest going on all over the world, the joy of work has been lost. And when that is lost the very heart of labor has been torn out of it.

Where are the men today who sit down to a bench or stand in front of some machine, and glow all over at the joy of creating or producing something that mankind needs for its comfort or its very existence? Where are the workers who are so absorbed in their task that they are more intent on finishing a product and making it worth-while, than they are in counting the minutes they are using the tools, and thinking of the raise of salary or pay? We do not deny the need of the living wage nor the need of shorter hours for many groups of labor. But we find more men with one eye on the hands of the clock and the other on the pay check, than we find regarding the product that the hand has made or the heart rejoices over.

The editor works eighteen hours a day, and often wishes there were more. He also knows scores of preachers who never count the hours of labor, and continue on in the ministry for very poor financial pay. He also knows a few teachers who do the same. All the farmers he knows work from twelve to fifteen hours a day, and a few of them are joyful workers.

But the mass of the workers of the world do not know the joy of work. They say the work is too hard, or too poorly paid, or too monotonous to be joyful. But from whatever cause, it is a sad and almost universal fact that during the "Industrial War" now being fought around the world, the "joy" of life has departed. The creation of a thing of beauty or of use carries no longer with it a sense of personal gratification.

Poor old Industrial World! Dependent on the movie for its entertainment instead of getting it out of its day's task! How some of us long to meet a worker who loves his work and rejoices over the output!

What did you say? What was that phrase you used? "Industrial Joy"?

There isn't any. Plenty of warfare, unrest, strife, dissatisfaction—but Joy? It is lost out of the world of labor. And the heart of labor is gone.

Movie Censorship

THE way to reform is to reform. Under the impulse of public opinion, the agitation for a clean-up of the movies has attained nation-wide proportions. It has won over practically all of the leading production concerns, and the prospects are that the smaller organizations will fall into line. And now the state legislature of New York has passed the Lusk bill for establishing a State Board of Censors for the Motion Picture Industry, which now goes to the Governor for signature. As he has been strongly favorable to the measure, there is little doubt that it will receive his approval. Further, it will probably stimulate similar legislation in those other states, which have no state board of censors at the present time.

But the campaign for clean movies has been headed for success even independent of official censorship. There has been a popular revolution in favor of the reform which has made itself felt in all sections of the country in the last few months. That the great film-producing organizations fully realize the situation is shown by the assurance they have already given the public of excluding from their lists any and every film of an objectionable character.

If the film fulfills its rightful mission, it ought to entertain, instruct and amuse, leaving no sting of regret behind. Too many of the movies in the past have catered to the lower instincts. They have presented those phases of life and character which every sensible citizen regards with repugnance. They have shown the lawless methods of criminals, and have thus become, especially to the young and impressionable, dangerous instructors by suggestion. At the climax, many of them were an offense to morals and good citizenship, and their energy and persistence in presenting such productions kindled indignation to such an extent that they were compelled for their own protection to draw the line sharply.

We look to the good faith of the corporations that have assumed the leadership in movie reform to do their work thoroughly and satisfactorily, and to keep at it until the evil of debased films is stamped out. This can be accomplished if they fulfil their pledge. Boards of Censors may help, and doubtless will; but the controlling concerns have the power in their own hands to make the reform clean and sweeping, and thus to win the approval of pulpit, press and people. In the end the censorship of an outraged public opinion will count more heavily in the scales for decent pictures than all the legal censorships that can be devised.

America Refuses to Mediate Reparations Dispute; Premiers Meet at Hythe

REJECTION by the United States of a German appeal to serve as mediator between Germany and the Allies and a meeting of premiers at Hythe, England, to discuss further measures for forcing compliance with the Allied terms were the principal developments in the reparations controversy for the week.

Germany's appeal was that President Harding could mediate the reparations question, fix the amount to be paid by Germany to the Allied Powers and obtain the consent of the Powers to such mediation. It promised "to agree, without qualification or reservation, to pay to the Allied Powers as reparation such sum as the President after examination and investigation may find just and right" and contained a formal pledge "to fulfil in letter and spirit all the provisions of any award."

Secretary Hughes's reply, dated only a day later than the German note, was brief, declaring that "this Government could not agree to mediate the question of reparations with a view to acting as umpire in its settlement." Expressing, however, concern over the seriousness of the issues involved and a strong desire for an immediate resumption of negotiations, it suggested that the German government should "promptly formulate such proposals as would present a proper basis of discussion" and offered to "consider bringing the matter to the attention of the Allies in a manner acceptable to them."

According to unofficial statements Germany had prepared a new scheme which included the following: The offer of a definite total sum to the Allies as reparations; a proposal to take over the Allies' debts to America; the fixing by an international arbitration court of the value of the deliveries already made by Germany.

Premiers Briand and Lloyd George met at Hythe on Saturday and Sunday, April 23 and 24, to decide on further penalties against Germany and to arrange for the holding of a Reparations conference early in May to which the United States will be invited to send a representative. Premier Briand sought British support for a plan drawn up by Marshal Foch for the occupation of the Ruhr region, including the industrial centers of Essen, Barmen, Eberfeld and Mulheim. This would increase the pressure on Germany and would enable the Allies to collect for the reparations account.

A demand by the Reparations Commission that Germany should deposit the gold reserves of the Reichsbank—about 1,000,000,000 marks—either in Cologne or Coblenz as security for reparations was rejected by the Berlin government.

Colombian Treaty Ratified

THE treaty with Colombia has been ratified by the Senate in virtually the same form as it was submitted by President Wilson in 1914 except for the elimination of an article expressing regret that anything should have occurred to mar the cordial relations between the United States and Colombia. The final vote was 69 to 19, or twelve more than the two-thirds needed, forty Republicans and twenty-nine Democrats voting for ratification, while nineteen Republicans and four Democrats opposed it. So ended a controversy lasting sixteen years.

Although the treaty opponents were few, they made a strong fight against ratification and caused considerable embarrassment to certain advocates of the treaty by reading excerpts from earlier speeches bitterly attacking it. Senator Borah fought ratification to the last, asserting such action would be notice to the world that the Senate had ratified the charge that "Theodore Roosevelt stole Panama." He twice placed the Senators on record on this through an amendment to assert specifically that the United States, in paying $25,000,000 to Colombia, did not admit that this government or any of its officials had any part in the Panama revolution of 1903 or that the United States ever had violated any of its obligations to Colombia. The amendment was rejected by votes of 49 to 39 and 58 to 30. The United States is to pay $5,000,000 to Colombia within six months and the remainder in four annual instalments of $5,000,000 each.

The House was busy on appropriation measures, some left over from the last session, with the limitation of immigration and reduction of armaments on the program for early discussion.

Harding Pleads for Pan-American Unity

A REAFFIRMATION of the Monroe Doctrine, with a pledge that the United States stood ready to fight if necessary for its preservation, and a plea for a greater degree of co-operation between North and South American countries featured President Harding's address at the unveiling in Central Park in New York city of a statue of General Simon Bolivar, the great South American liberator.

The day, the anniversary of the victorious Bolivar campaign in 1821, and of Lexington and Concord, was one for expressions of international friendship in which almost every nation of the two Americas participated; and at the time President Harding was speaking, General Gomez, president-elect of Venezuela, was placing a wreath at the base of the Washington statue in Caracas, with appropriate ceremonies.

Mr. Harding, after paying tribute to Washington and Bolivar and the democracies they established, entered upon a defense of the Monroe Doctrine and of its influence in maintaining freedom in the new world. "The history of the generations since that doctrine

There was a strong plea for greater confidence and co-operation between the nations of the two Americas, not only in their own interests, but in the interests of the older countries suffering from the devastations of war, the use of their increasing wealth to restore all the world. In this departure from a strictly Pan-American theme, one paragraph was interpreted as forecasting a call for an international conference to discuss disarmament. "In the last half century," the President said, "our American commonwealths have not only been able to hold themselves aloof from competition in armaments, but they have built up a system of international arbitration and adjudication which has constantly lessened the dangers of armed conflict. There is too little realization, fellow citizens of the Americas, of the progress that has been made toward judicial and arbitral settlements of international differences by the American nations. It presents an example well worthy of earnest consideration and affords us an assurance which will justify our purpose to invite present-day civilizations to cast aside the burden of armaments."

The stay of President and Mrs. Harding in New York was brief, less than four hours, but everywhere they were received most enthusiastically. All Latin-American diplomats to Washington were in New York.

Japan Stands Pat for Yap

THE Japanese cabinet has decided, according to statements in Tokio, that there is no reason to alter Japan's policy regarding the Yap mandate question because of Secretary Hughes's recent note, and that decision was reported an extraordinary session of its diplomatic advisory council. It was expected that Japan would make no reply to the American note before the Allied Supreme Council had passed on the controversy, but that she would yield if the Council upholds the American contention for the exclusion of Yap from the Japanese mandate.

Publication in both capitals of the correspondence on the Yap dispute, in which were three American and two Japanese notes, was followed by the assumption of a more unyielding tone in the Japanese press, which generally declared the Washington attitude to be unfair and held that the United States was attempting to exercise the right of veto over the decisions of the Allies.

The Japanese notes were curt and sharp in tone, stubbornly claiming exclusive jurisdiction over Yap to the exclusion of other nations from the use of the island as a mid-Pacific communication center on equal terms with Japan, and calling on the United States to prove that President Wilson and Secretary Lansing had made reservations regarding Yap. In one place the American position was characterized as involving "an extraordinary and an unreasonable contention with which no one would be likely to concur" and in another it was argued that if the Supreme Council had decided in favor of the exclusion of Yap from the Japanese mandate at a meeting at which Japan was not represented "it could not but have been regarded as an act of bad faith." Other expressions of like character showed the intensity of Japanese feeling on the subject and the determination to retain possession of Yap.

Secretary Hughes's note to the Powers cut directly through the minor issues raised in the Japanese notes and based the American contention on broad fundamental principles.

1,500 Liquor Arrests in New York

THE New York City police department has been making a great show of activity in its campaign against rum-runners under the new prohibitory laws of the state and 1,500 arrests in less than two weeks attested to the need of such a campaign. The record number of arrests for one day was 220, but on several days more than 100 were seized. The courts dealing with such cases were left far behind in the rush and there was serious danger that attempts to make the city really dry would be nullified by the inability of the courts to handle cases. Some authorities estimated that it would require two years for the courts to dispose of the cases of those already arrested if

The All-Transforming Motive

A Sermon by REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Matt. 10:39. "For My Sake."

FOR My sake." That is the supreme motive of the Christian life. We use this wealthy word "motive" in other spheres than the region of religion. In the realm of music and the fine arts the "motive" is the prevailing idea in the mind of the artist to which he endeavors to give expression to his work. In morals and religion the motive is the all-prevailing, determining constraint which gives energy, persistence, and direction to the manifold ministries of life.

"For Christ's sake" expresses the motive which is the all-controlling power in the hard and toilsome services of the Apostles. It sways everything. If I ask them why they supplicate in yearning intercession, they answer "For His sake." If I ask them why they minister in all manner of exhausting labours, they answer, "For His sake." If I ask them why they suffered the pangs of persecution, they answer, "For His sake." If I ask them why they continue in a daring defiance of death, again they answer, "For His sake." It is the all-dominant motive which constrains their life.

Now, I want to trace the influence of such a motive in the life in which it is enthroned. Suppose I exalted it as my supreme motive; suppose it ran like an inspiring, guiding clarion through my days; what kind of ministry would it exercise in my life? I seek an answer in the New Testament record. I find that this supreme motive is a great magician and effects wonderful transformations, and it is this ministry of transformation that I wish to consider now.

LET us begin here. It turns blood into seed. "He that loseth his life for My sake shall find it." Mark where the motive is placed. On one side of it there is "losing," on the other side there is "finding;" and between the two there is the all-controlling, transforming motive. "He that loseth." Loseth what? Life. "The blood is the life." Shall we then re-arrange the phrase? "He that loseth blood for My sake." Surely we have practical experience of this in common life! There is a world of difference between the man who sheds blood in a cause and the man whose labor costs nothing. We sometimes say of some fruitful toiler, "He puts his very life into it." That sounds very suggestive of a shedding of blood. Some people put blood into their ministry of intercession. They drain themselves in supplication for others. "Virtue" goes out of them even while they pray. Others intercede, but there is no pleading. They pray, but there is no exhaustion. They lose nothing!

Some toilers put blood into their services. They give their strength in seeking others, in guarding others, in leading others in the way of life. Others serve, but in the service there is no sacrifice, they lose nothing! Men are constrained to spend, and be spent, when life is lived "for His sake." They who company much with the Master appropriate His spirit of sacrifice, and for His sake they willingly give the strength they have. Now "he that loseth blood shall find it." Every drop of blood shed for the Master's sake becomes a seed. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." Aye, but more than that; all shed blood, all expended energy, all strength imparted in intercession or service is seed, and we shall find it again in fruits and flowers of the Kingdom.

*Dr. Jowett's sermons, prepared especially for the Christian Herald, are published in the first issue of every month.

There is a sweet legend which is supposed to narrate the origin of the lily. When Eve was driven out of Paradise she shed penitential tears, and wherever a tear fell a lily sprang. Spiritually, the legend has true significance; lilies of peace spring from penitential tears. And drops of blood shed in any kind of ministry are also transformed into living seeds, and we shall find them again in flowers of the Spirit, blooming in the lives of others, gracing and beautifying the children of God.

THIS motive turns services into delights. "Ourselves your servants for Jesu's sake." If we stop at the word servants and omit the concluding clause—"ourselves your servants"—we have nothing left but hard, dry, unalluring, unsatisfying toil. But add the final cause "for Jesu's sake," and monotony becomes harmony, and the service becomes a song. When soldiers

Sermon—"THE ALL-TRANSFORMING MOTIVE"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Jerusalem the Golden," or "Nearer to Thee."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

O Thou who art as gracious as Thou art powerful, and as forgiving as Thou art eternal, grant us Thy peace as we go our way to help bring about the peace of the nations from the war of selfishness and hate. And grant that some word or prayer at this hour of worship may make us ready to forgive any who may have wronged or forgotten us. In the Name of Him who is the world's only hope. AMEN.

march without the accompaniment of the band, the tramp is productive of speedy exhaustion. The music gives buoyancy to the spirit, and alertness to the limbs. There is a marked difference between an army marching to the sound of the trumpet, and an army plodding in silence. "For Jesu's sake" add to the music of the march, and the limbs dance to the song.

No one has more to say about service than the Apostle Paul. His epistles abound in the word; but no one has more to say about the spirit of joy and rejoicing. And in the Apostle's mind the two are combined. His labor is a rejoicing labor. It is toil accompanied by song. Is not this the characteristic of the service in heaven? "They serve Him day and night in His temple;" yes, and they sing, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." It is the service wedded to music. It is labor become delight. "Ourselves your servants for Jesu's sake." With that accompaniment how much hard labor can be endured! The district nurse goes through her dirty, repellant, and oft-times loathsome work, and the secret of her persistence is to be found in this constraint, "for Jesu's sake." There are few who would be paid to do her work; "for Jesu's sake" turns the drudgery into angelic ministry. It converts a task into a privilege, and a statute into a song.

THIS motive turns the world's reproach into a triumphant boast. "We are fools for Christ's sake." That is not the confession of melancholy. It is the triumphant boast of legitimate pride. Who said the Apostles were fools? The man of the world. The Apostles took up the world's reproach and wore it as a garland. For Christ's sake they were willing to be the fools of the world, and to wear the contumely as the insignia of their nobility.

"You are a fool not to have your fill of the world. What honeyed delights you are missing; what rivers of bliss you are passing; what carnal entertainment might be yours. You are a fool!" Yes, fools for Christ's sake! And the motive turns the indictment into an honor. "You are a fool not to take the first turning that leads to wealth. You are a fool to take the road called 'Round-about,' when there is a more speedy way called 'Short-cut.' It is only a fool who would so deliberately miss the primary chance!" Yes, but fools for Christ's sake! It is the road called "Round-about" that we meet the King, while the grassy way called "Short-cut" is devoid of His companionship. Fools? Yes, and with Him and in His fellowship we are fools gladly. And so the Apostles take up the reproach as a title and wear it as a distinction; the world's derision becomes the apostolic boast.

THIS motive turns thought into supplication. "For Christ's sake, strive together in your prayers to God for me." Let us take the very marrow out of the counsel. What is it? "For Christ's sake . . . pray." Then the motive makes me prayerful. For Christ's sake I become a suppliant and intercede for others. For whom do I intercede? For all about when I think. My thought for others is changed into intercession for others. Every thought is the prelude to a prayer. "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you, always in every prayer of mine making request." Every time the Apostle remembered them he prayed for them. His remembrance was turned into supplication. And he has made it abundantly plain to us how the transformation was effected. The Apostle never saw anybody alone. He always saw them in relationship to Christ, and all perilous bitterness was checked. If he thought of anyone who had ministered unto him, he saw them in relationship to Christ, and his thanksgiving was heightened into praise. Everything was done for Christ's sake, and therefore everything was seen in association with Christ. Therefore did remembrance become thanksgiving, and thought was changed into intercession.

And now we can make a vow. We can vow that henceforth, by the help of His grace, everything shall be done for His sake. If we sanctify ourselves in this vow, the Lord will sanctify Himself afresh unto us. Our motive will operate like a spiritual magician, and life shall be richly and profoundly transformed.

A WORD of appreciation for Dr. Jowett's sermons comes from Mrs. J. E. Nickerson, of Worcester, Mass., an ordained minister who has served as a missionary to Alaska. "I have just finished a second reading of the sermon, 'The Ministry of Individuality,' by Dr. Jowett," she writes. "For depth of spiritual vision, for a mosaic of truths that scintillate with a glory of splendor, to my mind it is unequalled. 'Difference does not imply antagonism,' the doctor wrote. And that gives me liberty to say, from years of service among almost every type of human nature, that the Love gospel through Jesus, by John, crowns the Work, where all else fails to reach the innermost longing of a human heart."

Slow Bowling

SUNDAY. II Cor. 11:14. "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light." That is the supreme crisis of the soul when the lightning visits us in the form of light. We can make some provision against the lightning. There are available ministries by which the fierce attack can be diverted, and the deadly fire misses its mark and buries itself in impotence. But when the forked lightning is changed into sunbeams, when we are basking in friendly warmth rather than fearing deadly bolts, when it is genial summer weather rather than terrifying storm, we are thrown off our guard and we are in deadliest danger. When Satan is revealed as an enemy we can fight him. It is when he is a friend that we are tempted to throw down our defences, and leave our gates unlocked, and even open them to give him hospitality. What the lightning could not do can be done by the light. He lays aside his terrors, and his gentleness destroys us.

I have been reading Mr. P. F. Warner's recently published book on cricket, and he has a good deal to say about fast bowling and slow bowling. He recalls the career of Spofforth, "the demon bowler," whose swiftness was laden with terror. But Mr. Warner tells us that the days of this terrific bowling are over, as experience seems to have decided that more deadliness can be hidden in slowness than in speed. Cricketers from the Colonies visiting England were nonplussed by the bowling of W. G. Grace. The big man seemed terrifying, and then there would come from his great presence "a gentle, lobbed-up ball," and the unacquainted visitor could not believe that this "baby-looking bowling" was really from the great man and so he got a little flustered, or he took liberties with it, and so lost his wicket. The deadliness of the seemingly gentle bowling! The lightning traveling in the vehicle of light! That is the supreme hour of moral and spiritual crisis.

Now, the New Testament warns us about these sunny seasons. It warns us of the hour when the fierce encounter is changed to genial approach. It records the startling fact that the sunniest hour may be the hour which follows a seeming triumph, the hour when the fighting is over and we put our arms to rest. It is just then, when the terrifying action is past, that we need to put out our sentinels and invoke the protecting power and grace of God. It was when our Lord's temptation in the wilderness was apparently over, and the tempter was beaten, that angels came and ministered unto Him. I can not think that the full explanation of these added resources is found in the Master's exhaustion. I think it is also found in His added danger. The tempter's withdrawal was only apparent. He withdrew only to change lightning into light, swift bowling into slow bowling, and it was then that reserves were added to the Master's forces.

And as it is with the individual, so it is with the nation. Our severest test is not in the hour of lightning, but in the season of light. A nation may stand up to terrific bowling, and may go down when the throw seems as playful as the movements of a kitten. The war is over, we have all relaxed, we have come to easier days. What then? "The terror by night" has only changed to "the destruction that wasteth at noon-day." What then? Are we to be slain by the sunbeam, we who marched through long lanes of destructive flame?

What is our resource? "Put on the whole armor of God." Wear it ever, night and day. Pray without ceasing. In everything give thanks. Let to live, yes, to live, be Christ. Meet the tempter in the abiding fellowship of the Lord. Face Apollyon in His fellowship. Yes, but also cross the Enchanted Ground in His fellowship. And night and day shall be to the glory of God. J. H. J.

Understanding the Scriptures

MONDAY. II Tim. 3:16. "The Scripture is profitable." In one of Krummacher's fables, he tells of a society of learned men who resolved to make a voyage to investigate the properties of the magnetic needle. The ship being ready to sail, they went aboard and placing a mariner's compass in their midst, sat down to observe it. To and fro they sailed, watching the needle, while each defended his own theory as to the secret power behind it. At length there was a violent crash; the ship had struck upon a reef and the waves were rushing in. Then these learned men, seized with terror, leaped overboard and swam ashore. Sitting on the barren rocks, they lamented one to another that there was no dependence to be placed on the magnetic needle.

There are scholars who scrutinize the Bible from the outside without appropriating its truth; and of course they see no profitableness in it. But there are others who search as for hidden treasure; and they find in its pages the unspeakable gift of life.

The man who reads, ponders and inwardly digests it, finds that the Word is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." He believes it and, naturally, proceeds to live by it. D. J. B.

"Not Good If Detached"

TUESDAY. I Sam. 30:13. "To whom belondest thou?" We have read the words "Not good if detached" on our railroad tickets. They are worthy of a broader application so as to include our relationship toward the Church and the Christian life. "To whom belondest thou?" was a question asked by David of a stranger who crossed his path. The stranger gave the name of the master he was serving. Should some David interrogate us on the way of life, what would our answer be? Would it be: "I am the child of a king?" Would we be able to say "I am a servant of Jesus Christ?" How wonderful a thing to be able to look the world in the eyes and declare, "I am a representative of the Kingdom of God."

It is necessary for all to know just where they are in the Christian life, whom they are serving most acceptably, and for what purpose. There is a difference between being an ardent disciple of Jesus Christ and a mere nominal Christian. There are star-distances between a life that is clear-cut and positive, and a life that is wavering and negative toward the values of the Kingdom of God. It is possible to have one's name written on the Church record and have one's name omitted on the roll of heaven. "Is your name written in heaven?" Are you on the pay-roll of the Father's business? The unorganized indifference of the members of the Church does more harm than the organized unrighteousness of the world.

There is nothing so dampening to enthusiasm or retarding to the progress of God's eternal purpose as an absentee membership. "But Thomas, one of the disciples called Didymus, was not with them." It was the evening of Christ's resurrection and the disciples had met to sorrow over their absent Lord. Jesus suddenly appeared among them and gave them the gift of the Holy Spirit. Thomas was not there to share in this great boon. He was compelled to wait a week, contending with his doubts and battling with his fears. What a week of mental conflict and agony of heart that must have been!

The Christian life means, among other things, that we plunge into the breach and make our influence felt for Jesus Christ's sake. Detached Christians pull no loads. Only he who is connected with the power of God is accomplishing the task assigned. R. B.

The "Power" and the "Glory"

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 6:13. "Thine is the power and the glory forever." What do we know of power? Very little. We have devised some very cunning engines of power whereby to employ natural agents, such as steam and electricity. But when we measure their energy, our unit of measurement is a single horsepower. How such a standard fails us when we attempt to measure the power of a flowing river or a moving glacier, or of the sea as its billows break on a thousand shores! Let us look at a volcano or feel the force of an earthquake, or the power of the atmosphere as it presses upon the earth's surface, or the energy that lifts moisture from the ocean and sends it down in rain upon the earth.

A Scripture writer uses a singular phrase, "the hiding of His power." Most of God's power is hidden. Ride over the continent these days and see the awakening earth. The soil appears to be mere inert matter; yet in that matter is magic power. Look at the earth at harvest-time. Whence all the beauty of field and meadow? It sprang from the dry brown soil. There is power hidden there. Here is an oat-field, there a wheat-field, yonder corn, yonder acres of berries, yonder daisies, poppies, roses. The capacity to grow all this is hidden in the soil. "The hiding of His power."

And the highest form of power is not mechanical or chemical or even physical, but moral. Consider the power of an idea. Nations have been built up on the basis of ideas. Civilization is not so much a matter of inventions and discoveries, of commerce and industry, as it is a matter of ideas which have become the common property of groups of people. At the heart of modern civilization lie three great ideas: God, Liberty, Brotherhood. God must be named first, for the other ideas grow out of that. God is the base-line of the triangle, Liberty the upright line, Brotherhood the line that connects them. If modern civilization represents moral power, it is derived from these ideas, and the whole structure rests on God. Faith in God, faith in Him as the personification of eternal righteousness, is the cohesive power of Christendom. God holds the race in the hollow of His hand. "Thine is the power." C. C. A.

The Living Soul in Man

THURSDAY. Psal. 8:4. "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" The Psalmist knew that man, the masterpiece of God, was crowned with glory and honor for all future ages.

When the body decays in the shadows of death, the soul, more brilliant than ever, makes its eternal flight. If seeds spring forth from invisible germs into beautiful harvest when the shell is sloughed off, may not the soul rise to the heavenly garner when the body lies in the dust? If gigantic trees are still waving after forty centuries of life; if water, rock and earth continue since creation's morning, shall man, the thinker, the poet, the musician, the sculptor, the discoverer, the builder, the son and heir of God, shall he perish in threescore years and ten? Before such a catastrophe the universe would put on mourning.

When the house of the body is broken, the soul is called to a grander residence, for man is the musician, not the instrument. Breaking the violin of the body does not destroy the melody, for he continues to play upon harps of gold in the orchestra of the heavens.

Faith, hope and love must be blotted out if the grave is to be our final destination. Is not death the night of a new birth into life, rising in the glory of eternal day? May not death be called our autumn of crimson and gold, prophesying the springtime of verdure and life? It is laying aside rags for robes, the mortal for the immortal.

We know something of the mission of the stars and planets, of the laws and forces of nature, but what is the mission of man, for whom all these have been created? Are forces to bury him out of sight? No; his being is a part of his infinite Father. He looks, lives and loves like every one in the Father's universal family. He is created in the Divine image and destined to an immortal existence of righteousness and happiness with God and the angels. E. W. C.

The Alertness of Sin

FRIDAY. Psal. 51:3. "My sin is ever before me." What a terrible thing sin is! Once become its debtor and it never seems to be satisfied. Once allow it to lick your hand, and thereafter you will find it crouching at your door.

The writer of the text is speaking of sin as a record that stands out clear and plain before him. Having stepped aside from the path of right, the circumstances and conditions in which he finds himself are like index fingers all pointing to one thing—his sin. No matter what way he may turn there is something to say "This would never have been had it not been for your sin." No wonder the poor man cries in almost desperation, "My sin is ever before me!"

But I wonder if we may not, without doing violence to the passage, consider these words as at least suggesting the time element? Is it not a sad fact that sin is ever before us in point of time? My sin may be forgiven, and I may be happy in this sense of forgiveness; but the sinful act or acts have set in motion waves that shall go on and on until they outstrip me in the race.

What a warning to those who play with sin! God has graciously promised to forgive the sin; but how sad to think that off in the future somewhere you may meet the "back-wash" or the "undertow" of an earlier mistake. Sin will get ahead of you in every deal. I. D. L.

"Jesus Only"

SATURDAY. Matt. 17:8. "When they had lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only." On this Mount of Vision the three disciples had seen Moses and Elias in conversation with Jesus. But as the heavenly light fades into common daylight, their eyes strain in vain for another glimpse of these other faces. "No man save Jesus only" remained discernible.

But why ask for more? Is not sight of the Master's face sufficient? Let Moses and Elias go into the deep shadows where they can not be seen. Let the dazzling brightness depart and take with it what it will! Vided only Jesus is still in the line of vision.

One can go down the mountain-side with Jesus alone and be unafraid. "Anywhere with Jesus I can safely go." I can forfeit other companionship if necessary, if only He goes with me. We only waste time in building tabernacles for Moses and Elias and their kind of visitors. Only let us be sure that by lifting up our eyes we can see Jesus and keep Him steadily in view.

It does not matter who comes and goes amidst the shifting scenes of life's longest day, "Save Jesus only." We can not get along without Him, and, thank God, He has promised to be with us to the end of time. He will not leave us. W. L. G.

Flimsy, Flavery Bubble Grains

Rice grains puffed to 8 times normal size. Toasted so they taste like nut meats. Airy, flaky food confections, to be served with cream and sugar, with melted butter, or mixed with fruit.

The finest of all the cereal food delights.

Add This Joy

To breakfast—all your people want it

Serve your morning cereals puffed—either Wheat or Rice. Whole grains are thus made enticing and easy to digest.

In every kernel we create 100 million steam explosions—one for every food cell. Thus every food element is fitted to feed.

This is Prof. Anderson's process. It makes Puffed Grains the best cooked cereals in existence.

It makes whole-grain foods so delicious that children don't neglect them.

It makes Puffed Rice so nut-like that it is used in candy making and as a garnish on ice-cream.

It makes whole wheat a tid-bit, delightful to children. And that is what every mother wants.

Puffed Wheat in milk, at any hour, is the best dish you can serve. As a bedtime dish nothing else compares.

Millions now enjoy it.

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers

The Great American Public

"ONE wonders," said the Clergyman sadly, "why so many motion pictures depend upon the sex theme—solely upon the sex theme—for their public appeal! One wonders why crime is so much advertised, and immorality—why the genus 'vamp,' he cleared his throat, 'is so much press-agented?'"

The Business Man, who is said to own some stock in the largest motion-picture company, nodded his head sympathetically.

"It does seem," he agreed, "as if it's nearly impossible, lately, to see a film that features happy home life, and girls that are sweet and wholesome, and manly, clean typical American boys. Of course, there are some such pictures—but they're very much in the minority"—he paused.

The Clergyman spoke again. "I wonder why," he said, and his tone was pensive; "I wonder why they are in the minority? Nearly everybody that I know is wondering the same thing, too. We want to see pictures based, as you say, upon the ideals of the real American home. We want our children to see such pictures. But instead of that—" he shrugged.

Hastily the Business Man took up the Clergyman's speech.

"Instead of that," he finished, "we see problems and passions and life in the raw. We often see things that we don't like to talk about—things that our children shouldn't even dream of. It is a pity!"

"I wonder," the Clergyman's voice was still pensive, "just what the producers are thinking of when they give us such pictures? Surely—"

The Business Man interrupted. "Oh," he said, "I suppose that they think the public wants such pictures. Every corporation, every company, every trade is founded upon the law of supply and demand. There must be some decided trend along the sex line—or else we wouldn't be seeing such a flood of sex photoplays. There must be a decided leaning toward the type of woman popularly known as a 'vamp'—or else she wouldn't be featured so much. People are evidently interested, this year, in the seamy side of life!"

The pensiveness had quite died out of the Clergyman's face. All at once his hand was banging down upon the arm of his chair.

"The public," he said, and his voice was firm, "is not wanting pictures of the—of the unpleasant sort. That I know! I don't want them and I represent the church-goers of the country. You don't want them, either, and you are an intelligent man of affairs. And other people don't want them, any more than we do. Of that I'm sure!"

I HAD been listening quietly to these men—both good friends of mine—as they talked. And silently I had agreed with them; silently and gladly. For I have always felt that certain much-advertised pictures—of the ultra-broad type—are not truly desired by the Great American Public. Of course it must be admitted that the Great American Public, as a whole, goes to see every picture that is produced, whether it is based upon the right sort of a theme or not. But that is because we, as a nation, are a tolerant and long-suffering people. We are slow, as a nation, to protest—slow to make a fuss about something that is not of intensely vital importance. It's one of our most pleasant characteristics—usually. That is why the Great American Public has gone to see one unfit play after another—and has said nothing!

It is not true, however, despite any regular attendance of the movies—despite the growing popularity of them, that the play with the unpleasantly suggestive theme is the one that is most in demand. It is not true at all! The popularity of the clean, wholesome plays that have been produced are the guarantee of the Great American Public's good taste and high ideals. When

Clean, Wholesome Stories
Are Certainly What It Desires in Motion Pictures

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

has a salacious picture drawn the crowds that flocked to see "Pollyanna"—which was published in the Christian Herald as a serial?

What cheap sex story has carried the appeal that was in the filming of Kate Douglas Wiggin's "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm"? I have heard both ministers and laymen say that "The Miracle Man" was every bit as good as a sermon. And I, myself, reveled in the charm and simplicity and splendid moral of Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird."

All of these pictures were successful—successful in an almost stupendous way. Crowds, all over the country, flocked to see them. Theaters were crowded to capacity, and extra performances were given. When Fannie Hurst's "Humoresque" was produced last year in New York the people who wanted to see it blocked traffic for weeks on the busiest part of Broadway. And "Humoresque" was a fine, clean story.

THE great popularity of Mary Pickford and Marguerite Clark is one of the healthiest signs of the public taste. They stand for pictures with an innocent, almost child-like appeal. Pictures of the great out-of-doors, of the gallant frontier West, of moral and mental rejuvenation, are also popular. Certain motion-picture companies who have gone in for sex-thrillers are not so prosperous, today, as they once were. The producers who stand for better pictures are the ones who make a great deal of money—much more than the producers who are secretive about their aims, and shady upon the subject of their motives.

A picture, though clean and worthwhile, can be exciting and intensely interesting. This is one of the points that is seldom made clear in a better pictures campaign—and one of the points that makers of suggestive pictures use as an alibi.

"We want to give the public a real entertainment," they say. "We can't feed the appetites of grown men and women on bread and milk!"

It may be true that grown men and women can not be fed exclusively upon bread and milk. But there was nothing bread and milky in the concert scene of "Humoresque," or in the "Miracle Man" when the little crippled boy, in a sublime burst of faith, threw away his crutches and walked. There was real pathos in "Pollyanna"—real joy in "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm."

Charles Ray, who plays only clean boyish parts, is one of the most popular men upon the screen. Will Rogers gives delightfully humorous optimism through his pictures. Douglas Fairbanks has inspired nearly every youngster in the country to reach his ideal of physical health and athletic perfection. And there are many others who stand for the same sort of thing.

No one would accuse the aforementioned men of being bread and milky—no indeed! Their characterizations are splendid food for any mind—be it a young mind or an adult one. And there is no reason why every picture should not be in the class that they have made popular.

Nearly everyone who attends the motion pictures has, at one time or another, seen an objectionable photoplay. And many people, because of such plays, have absolutely turned aside from anything that the motion pictures may offer. They forget that there have been many fine pictures produced, many films with great educational value. And they forget that, by ignoring all pictures, they are not helping to put aside unfit films and to further the influence of those photoplays that are useful and helpful as well as entertaining.

Do not, because of several unfortunate photoplays that you have seen, condemn all motion pictures. Do not turn aside from a really worth-while, clean pleasure.

Insist, instead, upon the right sort of pictures and, by the weight of your voiced opinion, broaden and make better a great avenue for the public good!

Working with Others

International Sunday-School Lesson for May 15

I Cor. 12:4-27; John 6:1-14

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

SIMEON STYLITES did not meet with much success in living apart from his fellow men on top of that column. He did not help mankind, though he did have a few followers who also sought to be pillar-saints. That was many centuries ago. Today the Bible truth is accepted that no man liveth unto himself and no man dieth unto himself. There are relationships which must be recognized, and all of these relationships bring obligations. Paul went about establishing churches and he wrote from his work at the church in Ephesus to another church, which was in Corinth. At the very beginning he related each of these distant churches to the church in Jerusalem and gathered money for the poor saints there.

The human body is wonderfully made and this perfect organism is used as a simile for the relationships of society, and particularly for the setting forth of the oneness of the Church, which is the body of Christ. Had Paul been an American he might have said, in preaching to a popular audience: "E Pluribus Unum." Note that the importance of each part is stated, as well as the dependence of each part on every other part of the body. Further, every part needs each other part—eye and feet, comely and uncomely. The body in perfect accord is seen at such a time as when the athlete is making the 100-yard dash in ten seconds.

Teachers of other than adult classes will get numerous suggestions by noting the special themes for the different ages of pupils. The primaries, or better called younger children, will study about "A Boy Who Shared." Their special Scripture portion is John 6 and they will follow the boy with the basket as the five thousand were fed. In speaking of that miracle one has said:

"'Twas seed time when He blessed the bread;

'Twas harvest when He brake."

The junior title is "Helping One Another." The intermediates have "Team Work" for their special subject, while the young people and adults can use "Co-operation and Competition." No one lesson method will fit every age. Always remember that you are teaching the child, rather than teaching the Book.

FACING the needs of the world today, it is evident that no individual can meet them. There must be a coming together of the units, thinking alike before the impact that wins can be made. This does not mean the loss of individuality. When the purpose or objective is of common interest, co-operation is comparatively easy. Recently nations dissimilar in racial characteristics came together to fight a combination of individuals who would not respect the rights of others. Self-interest and selfishness can be submerged for the sake of the common good, or even for the benefit of others. Today the world is beginning to ask "What should be done," and then saying "It can be done!" Not only are the needy thus helped, but there is a wonderful self-development by those who help to lift heavy burdens from the backs of sufferers.

In applying the teaching of this lesson the best place is to begin right at Jerusalem, which is the individual Sunday-school class of which the reader may be either a teacher or student. Each class should have some form of organization and no form is better than the complete one. Get new members, make your average attendance as near to 100 per cent. as possible, do a definite piece of work regularly. Stop right here and ask yourself—"What worth-while objective has our class right now?"

The World's Sunday School Association has a Surplus Material Department which relates those in the homeland with some missionary of your own denomination on the foreign field, that all sorts of things beginning with pictures, papers, books, baby organs, etc., may be sent overseas for a wonderful usefulness. During recent years more than 37,000 introductions have been placed, linking up some one in the homeland with a missionary abroad. For full information use the above name and address 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City. Name your denomination.

Each class, in turn, is a part of a Sunday school. That school also has some fine work on hand. Help the superintendent to accomplish the present job. Sometimes a large class almost forgets that it belongs to the school and its strength is to be felt in the pull with others. Then your school is a part of the city, the county and the state Sunday-school associations. You are also among the 18,762,581 counted in the International Association membership and likewise count in making up the 30,296,531 reported by the World's Association at the Convention in Tokyo. Your class also belongs to your church and you must help if their great program both at home and abroad is accomplished. The Master still can feed the needy world if each boy will take his full basket to Him.

FEW fear to hit at just one hornet, but they will not attempt to strike a hornets' nest. The reason, as Marion Lawrance states, is that they are organized. In Manila there was a small adult class of about twenty-four. They thought they should have a membership of one hundred and organized under the name of "We Brothers of Ninety-nine." When rally day came and the moving picture was taken seven hundred and seventeen passed the camera. It is not enough, however, just to have a big class membership, or even a large attendance. That class must follow the theme of our lesson, and work with others for the common good or to right some wrong.

Sometimes one attains such great distinction and is so much acclaimed that he forgets that he is vitally dependent on others. Great business men would be woefully handicapped if they could not get a stenographer for a week. It is quite easy to sit at a desk, press a button and expect the secretary to bring just the right answer. An organist of great reputation was decidedly annoyed when the organ blower, before these modern days of electric motors, remarked at the close of a rehearsal: "We make fine music, don't we?" The haughty musician said to the little fellow: "What have we to do with it. I am the player." The concert took place that night and the player was in consternation when, following a natural pause in the music, the organ ceased to sound. Just then the lad looked from around the corner and said: "Now say 'we.'" The organist instantly paid due tribute, though doubtless begrudged, and the boy renewed his pumping. Beecher said "One selfish man is enough to destroy the peace of a thousand."

Directed activities produce results. Every one possesses at least one talent and that talent, if used rightfully, can work wonders. The little hammer will still break a large stone. Our individual talents are to be related to the complementary talents of others, and placed under the direction of the great Leader, even Jesus Christ. Would that each one of us would submit to and obey Christ as instantly as when a football team is playing a championship game! Working with others on such occasions makes the winning score. The individual player may not like the signal, but he leaps into action. Too often we hear the signal that calls for action with others, and do not permit our part of the "body" to perform its work. Whereas the golden text holds us to continuous obligation and relationship, saying, "Ye are the body of Christ and severally members thereof."

Welch's Grapelade

the pure grape spread

WHEN one is two or three years old, there are so many things in the world named "No No" and "Don't touch." But Grapelade is not one of them.

Grapelade on a slice of bread or cracker is one of the first meanings of "good." Children love it and Grapelade can be given to very little folks in liberal quantities. It is a natural food—whole, ripe grapes and pure sugar—wholesome and nutritious. Grapelade is not a by-product. Only seeds and skins are taken out and acid crystals removed by the patented WELCH process, leaving a spread that is velvety smooth and thoroughly delicious. The older folks like it on muffins, toast and griddle cakes as well as on bread. And Mother uses it for jelly roll and other desserts and as a sauce for meats.

You can get Grapelade in large 15 oz. glass jars and smaller tumblers. Send for a Grapelade recipe folder.

The WELCH Lades—pure fruit spreads—include

Grapelade, Fruitlade (Grape-Raspberry), Peachlade, Cherrilade, Apple Butter, Plumlade, Strawberrylade, Blackberilade, Currantlade. All in 15 oz. glass jars.

If your grocer cannot supply you, a box of 9 jars of assorted Lades, as above, will be sent securely packed and prepaid on receipt of $4.50 (west of Denver $5.50).

The Forest of Mexican Ignorance

ico, in the direction in which it is going. He laughed bitterly when he told me of the curriculums which the newest "reformers" are imposing on the helpless Mexican youth, psychology courses at the age of 12, for instance, being an example of dilettanteism run wild, which he mentioned to me.

Such men as Governor Osuna are awake today and as disappointed as such fine spirits must be when they realize what has been done to their ideals and to themselves in the ugly round of personal aggrandizement to which their beautiful hopes were degenerated under the ministrations of Mexican politicians.

And what do they and what shall we think of Mexican education? I shall have something to say of that in a future article, but just here I want to remind you, by way of hope, that through nearly a generation the Protestant missions of Mexico have been working on that plan which John Dewey calls "education for life," and which in this country has had its most wonderful exponent in the work of Hampton Institute in the education of negro youths of our country for the work of leadership and teachers. The methods have differed and probably will have to continue to differ, but the ideal, the education of leaders to be scattered throughout Mexico, will go on and in it will be the great hope of the nation.

THE Catholics have sought, always, to raise up a Mexican priesthood, and much of their failure, in late years at least, has been in that their native clergy was poorly chosen, poorly educated, and lacking, too often, in the consecration which alone would fit them for their work. And this has been due to the fact from that 1857 to about 1900 the Mexican government closed the Catholic seminaries, so that save for a relatively short period in the latter days of Diaz, there could be virtually no education of Catholic leaders from amongst the Mexicans. The best priests and bishops came from Europe, often without the interest and devotion which is vital to missionary work. For all his objection to Catholic politics, Diaz allowed the seminaries to return, but Carranza, in his wild orgy of anticlericalism, closed and sacked them, and again forced ignorance into the Catholic clergy by Governmental edict.

But there is another interesting point, and one which we must not lose sight of in our search for hopeful signs in the Mexican horizon. Most of the Catholic bishops and hundreds of Mexican priests came to the United States in 1915, when they fled in terror before Carranza and Obregon. They were here, in exile, for nearly three years. In that time they were in American colleges, and visiting in American Catholic parishes, and there they learned what they could never have learned elsewhere in all the world—the opportunities for social service, the opportunities for true co-operation with Protestant workers, which the Catholic Church in this country has so well developed. They have now carried back to Mexico new ideals and new understanding. Much that is wonderful is to be looked for from this great new leaven.

Of government educational systems and plans there is less to say. The Obregon government has, on paper, re-established the federal department of education, with a cabinet officer at its head, which was abolished by Carranza as an economic measure. There has been some more of the endless Mexican discussion of systems of education, but so far as can be found no increase in appropriations or in plans for better support of the public schools. All those wait, perhaps, as I have said, on the improvement of business conditions.

But they wait, too, on something else, which I have mentioned above, and that is the improved physical condition of the Mexican people. Comfort, food and health are as important to mental and moral development as the training of the mind by education. This misery is so profound, its crushing inertia so deep-rooted and so self-perpetuating that it sometimes seems that it can never be cured from within itself. Some outside force must break the circle and this I believe is the great opportunity of the missions, alone or in conjunction with some other great civilizing energies.

ALREADY something has been done, by great American business concerns, and by American trade unions along the northern border and even within Mexico itself, to improve living conditions. But the terrible chasm of the Mexican mass remains utterly unplumbed, and the childhood of Mexico, and the manhood and womanhood of Mexico wait, hungry because their food does not feed them, in discomfort because their long traditions do not let them even desire comfort, in sickness because of utter ignorance of the foundations of human health.

Of this last a word must be written here. I have compiled the astonishing figures bearing upon this question and have found, in the mass of Mexican official statistics, that the death rate of Mexican babies under one year is nearly twice that of the United States, between birth and ten years, three times that of this country, and, clear through the whole range of Mexican life, that from two to four times as many Mexicans die in each thousand as die in the United States at the same ages. The average life of every Mexican born is but 15 years, while in the United States it is about 35 years, and half of the Mexican born this year will be dead before they are seven years old, while in the United States half of all the babies born will live to be 42 years old.

High death rate means sickness. Experts estimate that for each death in the United States there are 300 days of severe illness and 6,000 days of indisposition or slight illness, spread over the average 35 years of American life. But in Mexico the average age of death is 15 years, so that the days of sickness must be crowded into less than half the space of time they cover in the United States.

IN MEXICO, almost no care, as we conceive it, is given to the sick, and the government reports show that only one-quarter of all the deaths reported in the country are listed as "classified by the doctor"—in other words, there is no medical attendance at all in three-quarters of all the fatal illnesses in Mexico. It is well known to those who know that unhappy land that in the case of illness, the priest and the doctor are sent for at the same time, the priest to administer extreme unction, the doctor to do what he can with a dying patient.

This factor of ill-health in Mexico is one of the most terrible of all the pictures of her misery. No one who is continually ill can be greatly interested in progress, especially mental or moral progress, and indeed illness is the greatest force working against the material advancement of the people and of the country. And upon material advancement, upon the increase of income and the increase of needs physical and cultural—as the money comes to procure them—we must build the solidity of the Mexican people that are to be.

Out of this picture of darkness, then, comes opportunity and with opportunity the dawning of a new day in Mexico. Because ill-health is so great a factor as it is, there is something that we can attack and can conquer. Because education is at the low ebb that it is, there is something that we can do that is direct and tangible, when the means are put into our hands.

There is hope in Mexico, and that hope is tied up with the Protestant missions, which are actually, and even more potentially, the most disinterested and direct force working on conditions in Mexico today. That land is so torn by personal politics, so disturbed by persecution of and retaliation by business, so much a football of international calumny, that this single ray of clean, clear light can be recognized by all as the one hope in the horizon today. That hope must be made to dawn, and it is well for us to consider how that dawn may be assured, and how the day that must follow may be firmly grounded on economic permanence, on social stability and on the comfort, health and education of the Mexican people.

The Coffield has oilless bearings which eliminate all the bother of oiling.

The Coffield runs so silently you hardly realize it is in operation.

WHY WILL YOU CHOOSE IT?

THE Coffield Washer has so many features that are exclusively its own, that it's hard to tell which particular one causes so many discriminating folks to select it.

It may be because it works so quietly and smoothly. Perhaps it's the extra convenience of the Coffield wringer with the "touch o' thumb" water deflector which does away with awkward drainboards and wooden chutes that stick and bind.

Sometimes we think it's the simplicity of the Coffield and the ease with which it is handled.

Again it may be because people can tell at a glance that the Coffield is mighty well built and gives promise of long and faithful service.

BUT WE DO KNOW that when a family has a Coffield—the longer they use it the surer they are that they made the best choice. And that is a mighty satisfactory thing for us to know.

WASHES THE DAINTY AS WELL AS THE DURABLE

Faithful to the Last— That Good Old Serge Suit!

AFTER all, what wears better and looks as well for a longer time than good old serge? What a chance to chant the glories of this fabric!

It isn't necessary — you know from experience how serge looks—and how serge wears. You know because every serge suit you've ever had has worn like iron, has given fullest possible measure of real clothing value.

And the reason is as simple as simple can be: Serge is woven of the finest balanced worsted yarns, woven more compactly than in other fabrics. To this natural fibre-strength is added a series of compressions on the finished cloth which increases its compactness, solidity and wearing strength.

So today, when 'most men are all at sea concerning values in men's suits, Clothcraft Serge Specials—tested by over a half million wearers—have come to the rescue—"Specials" that not only have the merits of that good old serge, but are available to you at a distinctly economical price.

Clothcraft can do this because Clothcraft is the largest maker of serge suits in the country—they can therefore buy the raw materials much more cheaply.

Next, they have concentrated on the making of a few simplified models—the kind that real men like to wear. Cutting out the "fads and frills" has cut down the average suit cost considerably.

And third, through just such manufacturing "short-cuts" as are described below, additional production savings are made.

These savings go to you! So you may be sure that not only do you get a genuine Clothcraft suit in quality but you get it through retailers at a price astonishingly low.

For your new Spring suit be sure you get one that will be faithful to the last—get a Clothcraft Serge Special.

NATURALLY enough, Clothcraft's long experience in making men's suits has resulted in a series of revised manufacturing processes really unique. They save time and they save labor—by combining operations or by working faster and better than anything used before.

In stitching in the "telescope" in the turn-up of the sleeve, for instance, Clothcraft eliminates one complete operation by using a double needle. In making the pocket, Clothcraft uses a double needle and an automatic knife that trims as the needle sews; this saves the time of an experienced pocket-maker and eliminates two extra operations.

In making buttonholes, Clothcraft uses machines that not only cut the holes, but overcast them, and works them in such a manner that the buttonhole is stronger, better looking and often surpasses costly hand work. The net result of this and many other savings effected here and there throughout the Clothcraft Plant is not only better workmanship but better values for your pocketbook—at prices you can afford.

than a babel!" triumphed Mrs. Auld. "I've got the money he left with me, you know—and he begs me to keep her if I can, till he leaves."

"I'm getting afraid, without those glasses of his," debated Ruth. "Don't you suppose he will come on me, some day, right in the cottage and—suspect?" "Not he," averred Mrs. Auld, stoutly, "not when he's always in the woods, afternoons, thinking over his next chapter. Don't you quit coming, child, for—for my sake!"

The old voice quavered. Ruth, leaning over the chair, patted her cheek, whispering that, even if Sary Bryson failed the author, she'd never, never fail Nancy Auld!

"ARE you happy, child?" asked Mr. Gary, curiously, when the guests were gone and he and Ruth sat alone before the open fire that burned, after dusk, in the living-room grate, for the air was beginning to feel the chill of late summer, the forerunner of autumn, which was near at hand. "Are you quite happy, leading this simple life among these simple people? Don't you want some young folks' companionship?" It seems to me that Ellen Hawtree wouldn't satisfy me, if I were a young lady, accomplished, pretty—

"Ah, flatterer, hush!" laughed Ruth. "I am not accomplished—poor grandfather thought music and dancing and languages were silly—or I persuaded him to think so, because I did. And I'm an ordinary-looking girl, you know, only just healthy."

"Ordinary fiddlestick!" scoffed Mr. Gary; "there's nothing ordinary about you, in any respect! You are, I may say, one of the most wonderful girls of my acquaintance—indeed you are the most wonderful, for I don't know another one like you! And—and it's getting time, my dear, when young men are desirable as well as young women, as companions. And out here there isn't a single specimen of one, is there?"

"Why, no, indeed!" said Ruth, hastily, and a warm color glowed, quite uncalled for, in her cheeks, "not a vestige of a young man, dear Mr. Gary."

"That specimen who came with the Aulds, now," said Mr. Gary reflectively, "doesn't belong here, does he?"

"No—oh, no, indeed," declared Ruth, emphatically; "he is a city man out here for his vacation, and he's writing a book. Think of it!"

"Poor trade," allowed Mr. Gary, without enthusiasm, "except in a few instances, where they get rich from a successful novel. Writing a novel?"

"So Nancy Auld says," nodded Ruth, and explained the author's position. "I never met him before," she added.

"Bugs," commented Mr. Gary, briefly, "the idea of beginning to write, at his age—must be thirty or more—and expecting to succeed. Or does he expect to succeed?"

RUTH could not tell; later, after Mr. Gary had returned to his work in the city, she might have answered the question, for she met, more than once, the man who hammered on the typewriter in Nancy Auld's cottage, and had learned his history and his hopes.

The first time she met him was on an afternoon when she was walking briskly towards the Auld cottage, bearing a tray of good things for Nancy and her lodger. Many times she had caught a glimpse of him at the spring, which he loved to frequent—and always she had slipped by on soft footsteps, unnoticed. Now, however, she met him face to face, smilingly and unabashed, though the tray bore his meals which her hands had cooked.

"Good afternoon. I was hoping you'd come along," called the writer of a book, eagerly; "let me carry that, won't you? Or, better still, let me show you a nice dry log, where you can sit and rest a bit. This spring is picturesque, but damp."

"It is quite marvelous," smiled Ruth, calmly seating herself on the log. "I enjoy coming here and looking at it—the beauty of the willows, the flags and the cress, and this bowl of foaming, dimpled water. It is worth a whole farm, I should say."

They discussed the farm, Tom Auld,

Nancy, and their poverty; the beauties of nature, the superiority of the country to the city, and, when at last they walked towards the cottage, the writer bore the tray, sniffing delightedly at a familiar odor that crept from the folds of the napkin which covered it.

"Smells so good—like some cakes Sary Bryson, who chores out, makes for me," he confessed, boyishly. "Honestly, Miss Carfax, I was skin and bones till Tom Auld suggested I get somebody to do for me. I tell you, I'm afraid, when the time comes for reckoning, I'll be broke! That is, if she asks anything like what her cooking's worth."

"She won't," averred Ruth, thrilling proudly at his praise. "She's a country woman, you know, and food is cheap and plentiful out here."

He left her at the door of the cottage, lifting his hat and walking away back into the woods; Ruth took care to avoid them, going back, but afterward she met him frequently, and not always at the spring; indeed so openly did he watch for her, and so frankly did he declare his delight at seeing her, that Ruth could hardly refuse the poor soul the privilege of her company for a few moments—a girl with her soft heart could do nothing else.

"I like Mrs. Auld's name for you, Comfort-Bringer," he said, with a wistful smile. "I wish you could bring me a little, for my book is about finished, and I need comforting."

OF COURSE he had read her a few chapters of the great work. She had listened, thrilled, thinking it wonderful, but when he asked her opinion, her honest eyes filled with a blur of tears, and she shook her head. "I can't tell you, David Blair," she said, sadly, "because my opinion is absolutely worthless; I am utterly un-literary, and I don't know, truly. But oh, I do hope it may be a wonderful work—that it may make you famous."

"I don't know that I want you to have a literary mind," David Blair had answered, slowly; "you are best as yourself—a Comfort-Bringer to others—to everybody, I verily believe, whom you meet. I have been a failure all my life, Miss Carfax, in the worldly sense of the word; I have worked hard for my family, and held mediocre positions—I wasn't capable of any others; but always I held fast to this dream of some day writing, some day when I was free at last. I felt that it was unworthy, and I tried to smother it, while I had the brothers and sister to work for. This summer, thanks to the untroubled atmosphere of the Aulds' cottage, and to Sary Bryson's wonderful food, which put new life in me, I have had my chance to prove whether it was just a dream, or a beautiful reality I have made into a book."

Sary's cooking—how Ruth glowed at that! She, too, had helped him, and he would never know that she had been to him a real comfort-bringer!

Then the book was completed, was mailed to a publisher; in a few more weeks he would know its fate.

"But why did you send to those people?" queried Ruth, recognizing the publishers as almost inaccessible to new writers. "Why did you not try some lesser publisher?"

"I hitched my wagon to a star," said David Blair, whose face was drawn and pale with the stress of a supreme moment, "and if I fail, why I will just be a failure, that's all. But if I succeed, if I realize that I am at last out of the failure class, then," his face was illumined, his eyes shone with a light any woman recognizes as the light of love, "why then, there is something I will do—something I hope to, rather, that is greater far than anything else in all the world! But only if I succeed; if the book comes back—I will—burn—it—to ashes!" he spoke slowly, his voice thrilling with pain.

"Oh," cried Ruth, indignantly, "you shall not—you mustn't! You must keep on trying and trying."

"I can't do that, little Comfort-Bringer," he smiled, heart-breakingly, "with me it must be now or never. If the book comes back, I shall go back—into the world of failures, where I belong. If it does not, I may—I hope I may—enter Paradise!"

"Cyclo" Ball Bearing

Carpet Sweeper FOR THE JUNE BRIDE

HOW the pretty bride will look in a few years depends largely upon whether she uses out-of-date or modern appliances in her housework.

At any rate, it is unnecessary for her to be subjected to back-breaking, dust-raising sweeping methods. A Bissell sweeps quickly, easily, thoroughly. So smooth-running that it is guided about with one hand; so light that it is carried upstairs and down with one hand.

The young housewife will find by experience that a Bissell Carpet Sweeper provides the most satisfactory and convenient way for the daily sweeping, whatever other appliance she uses for the more thorough periodical cleaning. Costs the price of a few brooms—lasts for years.

Bissell's Lightweight Vacuum Sweeper has more suction than any other non-electric, even more than some electric, at a quarter their cost.

Mr. Lansing's Confession

A Review of His Disclosures Regarding the Peace Negotiations

By DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

MR. LANSING'S book on the events which occurred at Paris during the conference of the Allies over the Versailles Treaty perhaps was not intended to be a personal confession, but that is what history will finally call it. It is not, in the last analysis, a statement of what he believed to be grave mistakes, diplomatic and otherwise, of Mr. Wilson, but it is an account of how he, Mr. Lansing, failed to register his own convictions on questions of the most tremendous moral and ethical importance.

For example, he was opposed to secret methods employed by the old European diplomacy, and yet he used them himself throughout the negotiations. He was opposed on principle to the guarantee of independence and territory of governments and favored a mutual compact which should be "negative instead of positive," that is, the different nations agreeing not to do certain objectionable things, in place of guaranteeing in a combination to see to it that the rest did not do them. And yet in spite of that principle which he declares he held as a principle, he wrote to President Wilson:

"I am so earnestly in favor of the guaranty, which is the heart of the League of Nations, that I have endeavored to find a way to accomplish this and to remove the objections raised which seem to me today to jeopardize the whole plan."

Here is an illustration of an American citizen who was, on his own statements, made again and again, opposed to the diplomacy which had been the curse of Europe for centuries, employing it himself and resorting to its most servile and compromising habits in order to gain what he afterward said was the only hope of a final result. He is so much disturbed by his convictions in the matter of the guarantees and his direct contradiction of his own principles that he feels compelled to write the following "explanation" of his letter to Mr. Wilson:

"It should be borne in mind in reading this letter that I had reached the conclusion that modification rather than abandonment of the guaranty was all that I could hope to accomplish, and that, as a matter of expediency, it seemed wise to indicate a sympathetic attitude toward the idea. For that reason I expressed myself as favorable to the guaranty and termed it 'the heart of the League of Nations,' a phrase which the President by his subsequent use of it considered to be a proper characterization."

IN OTHER words, "expediency" and not convictions ruled the day. That is, old-world diplomacy was exercised by Mr. Lansing and personal convictions were dismissed as of little account. That is, an American, who had serious principles and convictions, allowed old-world diplomacy to have the right of way, and he finally signed the treaty "without reservations," although he had opposed nearly every article. Mr. Lansing had plenty of mental and moral "reservations," but he did not let them get in the way of "expediency." And what is old-world diplomacy but the subterfuge of weak souls who would rather win a point by compromise than lose a battle where principles were greater than expediency, and right and justice had no right to be set aside for that so frequent boasted compromise by which it is said diplomatists so often distinguish themselves.

Is not the world getting tired of "compromises" which juggle with the truth? Of what use is it to hold to principles and to have convictions, if, finally, they are all set aside for the sake of expediency? Mr. Lansing's account of affairs at Paris is a confession of a soul that lost out in the fight between new-world ideals and the old-world diplomacy of surrender and compromise.

How to Enjoy One's Work

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Eccl. 3:1-13, 5:16-20

THE only work that is enjoyable is the work that is conscientious and constructive, a work that makes us conscious that we are doing our part in progress and civilization; to realize that all honest work, no matter what it is or where, is worth while. We may be digging dirt in some reclamation project or adorning Cathedral walls with angel faces. We may be only a janitor contributing to the comforts of the tenants or the superintendent of the building responsible for every detail. We may be the hewers of wood and drawers of water in the army of toilers, or the generals and the captains.

It is not the kind of work that counts, but the quality; not the quantity of the production but the fidelity to the task that weighs. Work, high or low in the scale of being, is a joy when we recognize that every one should be in his place and that there is a place for every one. "Faithful over a few things we shall be rulers over many." Let us regard work as a Divine gift, part of the eternal plan, every pen-stroke, hammer-blow, needle-stitch, be it what it may, our share in the building of an efficient civilization and more comfortable existence. The true aristocrat is the man or woman who works.

Life in its highest sense is ministry, service, doing, creating, fashioning. Idleness is a sin, crime, tragedy, mistake. God is a worker. Jesus is a worker. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." Find your work, do it faithfully. We like to do that which we like to do well. We do well that which we like to do. That which you can do well is your work and your joy.

"Toil and be glad! let industry inspire Into your quickened limbs her buoyant breath!

Who does not act is dead."

Anniversary Day

E. L.

THERE are two ways in which this topic may be presented. The anniversary of the local chapter may be observed or the anniversary of the Epworth League itself may be the feature of the evening. For the sake of the League locally or at large no doubt the following brief sketch will be of value:

The Centennial Conference of American Methodism assembled in the Mount Vernon M. E. Church, Baltimore, Md., Wednesday morning, December 10, 1884. A paper was read by Rev. J. H. Vincent, having reference to forming young people's societies, to be known as "Oxford Leagues." The subject was referred to a special committee and it reported favorably stating the objects of such societies to be: Scripture study, cultivation of a nobler Christian character, the study of the Christian classics for literary culture, the devising of methods for doing good to others. Before this the Young People's Methodist Alliance had been in existence. Subsequently other young people's societies were formed and at a conference of representatives of the various organizations, held in Cleveland, May, 1889, these societies were all merged into what is now known as the Epworth League. Since then it has grown to be one of the greatest forums in the world

all demanded jury trials and some pessimistic statistician came forth with the statement that 8,000,000 citizens would have to be called in order to provide unprejudiced jurymen. Magistrates were requiring chemical analysis of all liquid evidence, and here again there was trouble, with the city's staff of chemists said to have enough work ahead for seven years.

Richard E. Enright, the Police commissioner, predicted that the days of the saloons still doing business were numbered, and expressed a belief that the city could be made bone-dry if additional men and funds were provided. He said the policemen were determined to enforce prohibition "even though the dry law is probably distasteful to most of them."

One step which was expected to do much toward killing the open saloon was the sending of warnings to the owners of property housing saloons as a preliminary to the issuance of liens against the properties to insure the payments of fines. The threat of having to pay the fine of a defaulting saloon keeper would tend to make every landlord of saloon property a potential enforcement agent.

DRYS WIN IN ONTARIO. The Canadian province of Ontario voted for bone-dry prohibition by a majority of about 200,000 out of 1,000,000 ballots cast, the cities going wet by small majorities and the rural districts overwhelmingly favoring prohibition. The province went dry in September, 1916, under a war measure which was lifted more than a year ago; and this referendum was the second which the drys have won by huge majorities in the last two years.

WASHINGTON RECOGNIZES ZAYAS ELECTION. The American State Department has issued a statement recognizing the election of Dr. Alfredo Zayas to the presidency of Cuba, and urging the Cuban people to accept the verdict at the polls as final.

MANY KILLED IN ITALIAN RIOTS. Many clashes between the extreme nationalists and the communists and socialists have occurred in the election-eering for the general elections in Italy now in progress; and in a single day, fourteen persons were killed and one hundred wounded in such riots in the province of Tuscany.

NEW TRINITY RECTOR CHOSEN. Rev. Samuel Smith Drury, rector of St. Paul's Preparatory School at Concord N. H., has been elected rector of Trinity Episcopal Church in New York City, to succeed Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, who became a bishop. Dr. Drury, who is forty-three years old, will receive a salary of $15,000.

DR. A. W. HALSEY DIES. Rev. Dr. A. Woodruff Halsey, since 1899 secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., died at his home in New York City at the age of sixty-eight.

SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS RENT LAWS. Legislative enactments designed to keep down rents in the state of New York and in the District of Columbia were upheld by the United States Supreme Court, by a majority of five to four, on the broad ground that in a case of public exigency the limitation of the rights of real property is justified.

A CONVERT TO DRY CAUSE. There was rejoicing in the lower house of the West Virginia legislature when J. A. Strother, for many years leader of the wet forces in the state, made public announcement of his intention to support prohibition.

NEW YORK BIBLE SOCIETY DEDICATES NEW HOME. The New York Bible Society, which was organized in 1809, has dedicated its new building at 5 East Forty-fifth Street with appropriate ceremonies.

Five Things

That science now urges for the teeth

Dental science urges that a tooth paste should have five distinct effects. A dentifrice has been created to meet all these requirements.

Millions of people now employ it, largely by dental advice. This is to urge that you try it—free—and watch the change it brings.

To remove film

One great object is to combat the film which causes most tooth troubles. You can feel it now—a viscous film. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

Brushing teeth in old ways does not end it. The most careful people have rarely escaped its attacks.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Two effective ways

Science has now found two effective ways to fight film. Convincing tests have proved them. Leading dentists everywhere advise their daily use.

These methods are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And other factors, now urged by authorities, are embodied with them.

Watch it for ten days

Each use of Pepsodent effectively combats this harmful film. Then it leaves the teeth so highly polished that film-coats can not easily adhere.

It also multiplies the salivary flow. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling and may form acid. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

These are natural aids to Nature. They might come through proper diet. But dental science now desires them in the tooth-paste too.

Watch the benefits they bring. Send the coupon for the 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

When you see the results and read the reasons for them you will join the millions who are cleaning teeth in this way.

Cut out the coupon now.

Rev. J. W. Boyer, whom Christian Herald readers will remember as superintendent of the orphanage they established at Chinkiang, touring the famine district in a Peking cart

China's President Sends Appeal

THE President of China, Hsu Shih-chang, has appealed to the American people for continued assistance for the famine sufferers in the following cable message which has been forwarded to the Christian Herald from Mr. S. K. Alfred Sze, Chinese Minister to the United States.

“The work of famine relief in the northern province since last year has consisted in the continual purchase and distribution of food, clothing, and farm seeds for spring sowing.

“The amount of contribution obtained by the Government Famine Relief Bureau and the National Relief Society has reached the sum of over $3,000,000, while different provincial governments and other charitable organizations have collected and spent $10,000,000. The above-mentioned sums do not include the proceeds realized from the loan of $4,000,000 secured by the surtax in imports, as well as the money handled by Chinese-foreign Relief Committees. The number of famine-stricken sufferers is estimated 15,000,000. Contributions thus far received have been sufficient to take care, in some form, of all but about 5,000,000. These 5,000,000 still remain to be saved.

“The Provinces of Honan and Shantung, which have been blessed this spring with considerable snowfall, may count upon a good early crop. . . . In the Province of Chihli, there has been little rain and snow, and the prospect of a good crop is not bright. This is the time which is between sowing and harvest that relief is most urgent.

“China is looking now to the American people with whom she has the strongest ties of friendship to help her meet the crisis she faces in the next few weeks. America has already contributed much, for which China is very grateful, but if America can give more it is certain to be the means of saving thousands of lives.

“The Central Government is doing its best to meet the situation in spite of the present financial stringency.”

THE next four weeks in the campaign for funds for the relief of starving China may be compared to the last lap of a grim race between swift, determined runners. The crisis in the relief situation has been reached, international and other funds having been practically exhausted by purchases of grain. It is now incumbent upon the Christian people of the world to provide the necessary means to insure the victory for life, instead of death, in the terrible contest involving five million helpless Chinese people.

To strengthen the powers of the forces of mercy and relief in China, the American Committee for China Famine Fund has designated the first eight days in May to be observed as “China Famine Week.” In these eight days scores of activities by churches, business and social organizations, and individuals in every part of the country are centered on aid for China's starving millions. Sunday was set aside for special appeals from the pulpits of the churches, and in many cases special exercises by Sunday schools were arranged.

The most popular suggestion for the observance of the week is the “Pick a Pal in China” idea. During the entire special period of appeal men and women and children are asked to imagine that they have actual famine sufferers as guests; each taking the guests about and treating them as one treats oneself, to lunch, dinner, sodas, tickets to entertainments, and the like. Practically the scheme means the laying aside of the equivalent of the money that the man, woman or child spends, each time one makes an expenditure, and in the end the contribution of the total to the fund for Chinese relief.

“Send What You Spend to a Starving Friend” is to be the slogan for this particular phase of the week's activities, and many who may not find it possible to give the equivalent of all that they spend in a week, are to give the cost of one meal each day.

Another popular suggestion for a slogan was “Save the Last Five Million”—thus emphasizing the tremendous scope of the work still to be accomplished—and it is confidently predicted that the Christian people of America will respond to the appeal for personal sacrifice in order that lives may be saved.

Four mothers, guided by an attendant, leaving the hospital with their babies to receive their monthly allowance. The babies wear wadded garments provided by the Women's Famine Relief Society, Shanghai CONTRIBUTIONS to the Christian Herald China Famine fund for the two weeks closed as this issue goes to press were $16,969.77, bringing the grand total up to $540,080.82.

Free Circulars for Investors.

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1. Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11. To invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, yielding 6½ per cent. present prices, are featured in Circular No. 30. The net earnings available for interest charges in 1920 were five times the interest charges.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Kingdom of Belgium 20-year 8 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, redeemable at 107½ per cent., and yielding over 8 per cent. are described in Circular 34.

Circular 35 describes Pacific Gas & Electric 1st mortgage 20-year 7 per cent. bonds, yielding 7½ per cent. annual return.

Details of Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 7 per cent. gold bonds, maturing May, 1931, at a price to yield over 7 per cent. are given in Circular 36.

Swift & Co., 5-year 7 per cent. notes, to yield over 7 per cent., are described in Circular 37.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6% First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for circular 38.

Record of Investments Chart—a simple chart for listing your securities which shows at a glance your monthly and annual income, together with necessary information on Federal Taxes—Ask for Circular 39.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12½%—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 42.

Barnsdall Corporation, 7 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold bonds to yield about 9 per cent. own and operate properties in 14 States. Total net assets 377 per cent. of this issue. Circular 40.

Circular 41 gives full information concerning a 7 per cent First and Refunding Mortgage Bond yielding about 8 per cent. 1920 earnings amounted to more than twice the annual interest charges on all underlying bonds including this issue.

Business Lessons for 1921

WHEN 1921 was ushered in it is probable that every business man in the country heaved a sigh of relief because 1920 had ended. And yet that twelve-months, despite all the trials and tribulations they brought us, were rich in experience which should be capitalized in the current year and for many years to come. Today we feel assured that, although there are many readjustments yet to be made in the months and years to come, there is every reasonable assurance of a return to more normal business conditions, stabilized prices, easier money and larger business opportunities during the current year.

Surely 1920 impressed upon all of us the folly of extravagance in personal business and governmental affairs. During the year that has just passed we should have learned as never before the folly, and worse, of undermining the moral basis upon which modern business is founded through unjustifiable repudiation of contracts. We should have realized the folly and danger of inefficiency; of unsound and uneconomic taxation; of Government participation in essentially private business; of trying to substitute legislative enactments and administrative decrees for natural economic laws; of permitting raids upon the Treasury for the benefit of any special interests—and, above all, for the purpose of sustaining the prices of any commodities above their market level. When commodity prices are artificially supported every element of our population, including finally even the favored class that temporarily profits, is penalized through keeping taxes high and preventing a reduction in the high cost of living.

The experiences which 1920 afforded in public finances should have taught our legislators that a taxing system based on temporary and abnormal conditions cannot justly be continued when those conditions have passed. An excess profits tax, for instance, will be adequately productive only so long as there are sufficient excess profits to tax; otherwise it must inevitably and rightly fail. France is learning, if we are not, that a tax which is dependent largely on the continuance of high prices is unscientific, for rational attempts toward a resumption of normal conditions and lower prices automatically act as checks on revenues.

WHEN the war ceased, shortsighted men thought that the United States, with its great riches, would escape the effects of the awful destruction of life and industry and wealth in Europe, as they had unwisely believed we could stay out of the conflict, and might prosper indefinitely upon the urgent needs of the remainder of the world.

It is clear enough now that when two or three hundred million people are forced to reduce consumption and are unable to achieve more than a small percentage of customary production for a considerable period, the surplus products of the rest of the world, upon which Europe formerly relied for raw materials or food supplies, accumulate in warehouses or lie ungathered, while the commodities for which they are normally exchanged fail to move over the trade routes between the nations. Yet it has taken two long years to bring about a general appreciation of this fact, and many have even assumed that it could be ignored.

One of the chief tasks of this year should be to aid the restoration of Europe to normal production by using all our own great resources in finance and in initiative. Europe is for the most part courageously endeavoring to help herself—and that is her greatest asset, as well as our best guarantee. There are hopeful signs of recovery, particularly in England, France and Belgium, but until the terms of the German reparation are fixed and peace is made a reality there will be economic and social disturbance.

We, in America, should have the courage to meet the demands of after-war world conditions, if afflicted Europe is striving bravely to do so. We can far better afford as a nation to send our surplus cotton, grain, or other products to needy countries on long-term credits than to permit these commodities to lie unconsumed, while new crops are harvested and a new surplus of manufactured goods is forthcoming to depress prices still further in domestic markets.

THE credit expansion here since 1914 has occurred without destroying the essential safety and strength of the reserve position of our banks. Expansion of bank deposits and note circulation since 1914 is an outgrowth of an increased stock of gold and a more effective use of banks through the increasingly efficient use of the Federal Reserve System. The total resources of all banks of the United States on June 30, 1920, amounted to $53,000,000,000, not including Federal Reserve Banks, a figure that exceeds the combined bank asset of all other leading nations of the world.

The period of readjustment, through which we are now passing, has been marked by the most rapid and extensive decline in prices in our history. And measured by actual test under such conditions, which is the essential thing, our banking system has proved to be sound and not unduly expanded.

There are problems before us to which the banking community must give heed—which, indeed, demand serious consideration and co-operation. Every period of money strain and business depression brings forth a fresh crop of panaceas for the most part unsound, and usually vitally affecting banking practices and financial integrity. Against all such efforts we must be upon our guard.

This nation needs even more than stabilization of prices and economic conditions—a stabilization of mind. It is time for us to turn away from those false prophets who have inflicted their fallacious theories upon a suffering world, willing, in its misery, to try any alleged cure for economic and political ills. It is time for us to turn a deaf ear to pessimists and rumor-mongers.

The situation today demands, above all things, wise and courageous leadership, and behind it the intelligent co-operation of constructive forces. We believe that the political, social and economic system of this country has, on the whole, justified itself as more productive of human happiness and progress than any which the world has yet tried, in spite of the obvious limitations of human nature. To forsake the established order of democracy, economic sanity and private enterprise, to follow false gods into untried fields of experiment, would be suicidal folly, and right-minded, responsible men must be on their guard as never before to resist such efforts.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

PERPLEXED." Delaware, Ohio: 1. Jesus Himself placed absolutely no limitations to the power of prayer. And if we study well the Master's advice in this regard, we will receive light to help us. Then we will not ask amiss. In praying, we ought always to be mindful of the fact that God's will, not ours, should govern our petition. What would you think of the wisdom of an earthly father who gave to his little child, just able to lisp its needs, all of its desires? Such foolish indulgence could only have one result—danger for the child. So our Father above, who knows what His children need, and who wants to supply them "with all things really needful," may be trusted to do better for us than we are capable of asking. We are privileged to carry our troubles to Him in prayer, but we need the faith to trust in His wisdom to do that for us which is best. "Not our will, but Thine be done," should be the spirit of every prayer we offer. Then the prayer that is offered by a faithful heart—the simple, earnest petition, leaving the decision in His hands—will be answered. Seeking first the things of the Kingdom—the spiritual blessings—we have the divine assurance that all the rest will be added unto us. 2. You ask how the evangelist knew in what words Jesus prayed in the Garden. Commentators agree that there could only be two ways of explaining this: (a) either they had witnessed the agitated scene which Luke describes (chap. 22: 41-44) and overheard His expressions of agony, or (b) Jesus had kept the three near to Himself and allowed them to share this most trying scene, in an intimate and sympathetic relationship granted to no one else.

Mr. Paul Philpin, of the Tract Society of Muskogee, Okla., writes concerning the movement for the widespread use of evangelistic signboards, in preparation for the next general revival, indications of which are already beginning to appear on the spiritual horizon. The plan is to use the same verse (Romans 10: 9) all over this continent. The evangelistic signboard movement has already spread to twenty-five or thirty states.

A. L. W., Chicago. The title of the sermon is sensationally chosen, probably intentionally so, in order to attract an audience, yet it is not without authority. See "The foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men," 1 Cor. 1: 25.

Rev. Ben Cox, Central Baptist Church, Memphis, writes that the Prayer League which started in that city in 1914, with just eight members, at its first meeting in the pastor's office, now numbers over 3,000 members.

J. P. Williams, of Brady, Tex., who wrote asking some one to send him a copy of the old hymn, "Oh sing to me of Heaven," has received some thirty answers, and more still coming. He asks the senders to accept thanks through the Mail-Bag for their kindness.

A preacher in a Long Island town, who is saddened by the slowness of the Sunday gatherings at the services in his little church, writes: "There is no end to the excuses people make for absenting themselves from Church on Sunday. One of the latest we have met comes in the form of substitutes for the living Word. It is argued that people may find a good helpful sermon in the Sunday paper, and fare just as well spiritually as those who attend the means of grace. This is surely one of Satan's delusions to empty the church and lessen its influence in the community. As a pastor who preaches three times each Sabbath, I feel keenly in the matter and I have wondered where our Churches would be if there were many who took to the form of living without the Church service. What of the prayers, the influence of fellowship; what of the warm handshake you may give to another; and what of the example to the weaker brother and the witness for Christ to an unbelieving world? I would like to ask any reading these lines who may have been so tempted: 'Do you pray and look up to God when you stay home, or do you not find that the enemy of souls artfully contrives so that by household duties, or the constant coming in and out of friends, your mind is never free to commune? There is one danger we are apt to overlook when we stay home on Sundays: it is that we make it possible for some to spend the day lightly in visiting. Think and ask what would Jesus do in such a case and think of Heb. 10: 25.'

There are doubtless thousands of other ministers who are passing through the same trying experience. They have our sincere sympathy. The condition of the Church today, while better than a year ago, is still a serious problem, but we believe that faith in God, prayer and earnest effort will go far toward winning back the In Different. Such a church should pray for a real revival and prepare for it. We have sent his letter to the Prayer League.

25,000 Words Frequently Mispronounced

There are 25,000 Chances for You to Make Yourself Ludicrous in the Pronunciation of English Words

And yet the man or woman of good breeding cannot afford to take a single one of them.

It Is An Exceptional Book

When publishers can say "it is sold throughout the English speaking world."

How much greater and far-reaching when we can say we have a book that was translated into eighteen languages, other than English, and that the sales have exceeded

22 Millions of Copies

This is the record of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book.

That a book should sell up in the millions of copies and still continue selling, although nearly a quarter of a century has passed, is the best of all evidence of genuine public appreciation. Ten millions have bought and read it in England, and more than ten millions in the United States, with several additional millions among the people of other lands and languages.

THE PUBLISHERS' WEEKLY, the leading paper of the book trade, says: "The most widely read book of the last 200 years is 'In His Steps,' by Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, editor of the Christian Herald. It has sold more than twenty million copies, the largest sale of any book except the Bible and 'Pilgrim's Progress.'"

Every member of your family should read this wonderful book.

HEART STORIES

1 Volume, 12 Mo., Large, Clear Type, Cloth Binding

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases as an agent in human affairs. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes that have been treated in short-story form—a form of which Dr. Sheldon is a master.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the "Good Fight," who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold, in "As Heaven Views It," whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in "Why the Minister Remained"; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in "Of Such Is the Kingdom" and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; "Sunrise on the Mesa," is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; "His Christmas Gift" is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled "Guests of Honor," in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself.

The Christian Herald for one year, 52 weeks, and a copy of Heart Stories, cloth binding, both postpaid for only $2.50. The book sold separately, postpaid for $1.25 is a dramatic presentation of the probable action of Jesus, if He were living in our time and confronting the problems of modern life. For instance, What Would Jesus Do in these ten surroundings:

"IN HIS STEPS TODAY"

The Industrial Conflict, The Press, The Home, The Church, The School, The Railroads, The Drama, The Farm, In Politics and in International Affairs.

The style of the treatment is the dialogue form, with Jesus seated at the table with the characters representing these departments of human energy discussing their problems with him.

The series now being completed in the Christian Herald from week to week is being brought out in permanent book form to fill the demand which we anticipate for many thousands of copies.

*“—the richest cake
I ever tasted—and made without butter”*

MANY housewives still think that butter is needed for making rich cakes and pastries. This is an old fashioned idea — rapidly being abandoned by modern cooks.

People who have been using butter, lard or ordinary fats in cooking can hardly realize how rich and satisfying—yet light and thoroughly digestible, their cakes, pies and pastries are when Mazola is used.

As every good cook knows, the old-fashioned way of cooking with animal fats makes cakes heavy and pie crusts soggy.

One has to be an expert cook and know just how to handle an oven to cook with butter or lard.

Even beginners get perfect results with Mazola. Cakes are rich and wholesome—bread and biscuits light and delicate-tasting. Pie crust is always brown and flaky—and so appetizing that you want to eat every bit of it.

Much More Economical to Use Mazola

Not only is the food more delicious and digestible, but you use  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{1}{3}$  less Mazola than you need of either butter or lard.

Mazola is free from moisture, as found in butter, lard and ordinary cooking fats. It is an absolutely 100% pure vegetable fat.

Being a liquid, the tedious and time-wasting “creaming in” process is easier. Mazola is always ready for instant use.

For the Finest French Pastry

The finest French pastry is now being made with Mazola. It is delicate in taste, and with a greater richness; for Mazola gives richness and avoids sogginess.

Leading clubs, hotels, hospitals, sanitariums and institutions use Mazola. It is the favorite cooking and salad oil on dining cars of leading railroads throughout America.

Mazola is sold in pint, quart, half-gallon and gallon cans by grocers everywhere.

A Royal Funeral in Jerusalem

"The Angel at the Tomb," painted by Verestchagin, one of the treasures of the Church of St. Mary the Magdalene.

Part of the interior of the Russian Church in Jerusalem, showing its elaborate decorations.

THE little gold-domed Russian Church of St. Mary the Magdalene in Jerusalem recently was the scene of a double funeral which tragically illustrated the tremendous changes which war and revolution have brought in Russia. One of those who found a last resting-place there, was the Grand Duchess Elizabeth, loved by the Russians as intensely as some others of the Romanoffs were hated, wife of the Grand Duke Sergius and a sister of the late Czarina of all the Russians; and the other was a Russian nun who died with the Grand Duchess at the hands of the Bolsheviki, rather than leave her.

The church, which stands on the Mount of Olives, just above the ground rendered holy to all Christians because of its general acceptance as the site of Gethsemane, was built by order of the mother of Grand Duke Sergius in the days when Russia's aristocracy was at the height of its glory; and the Grand Duke Sergius and the Grand Duchess Elizabeth were sent to Jerusalem to participate in the ceremonies of dedication. It was a splendid and joyous occasion, in vivid contrast to that when her body was returned there for burial after being transported across many thousands of miles of land and sea.

After the assassination of the Grand Duke Sergius, his widow built a convent near Moscow and took refuge in it. Here she was found by the Bolsheviki in the spring of 1918, and finally was imprisoned at Alapaevsk, not far north of Ekaterinburg, where the Czar, the Czarina and their children were murdered. The nun had refused to seek safety by leaving the Grand Duchess, and with her and other Romanoffs was blindfolded and cast into a deep pit or mine, about the middle of July, 1918. The bodies of the Grand Duchess and of the nun were recovered by the forces of Admiral Kolchak and were sent to China, when defeats compelled the White armies to evacuate the territory.

From China the bodies of the Grand Duchess and the nun were sent to Cairo, Egypt, and being accompanied Marquis and March sister of the Grand Duke, 1917, also the British subject and war. The party

The Church Facing the Future

What the War Has Taught the Country's Religious Leaders of the Problems Before Them in the Coming Years

Chairman of the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook

WHILE we were still at war it became clear to those who were engaged in the war work of the churches that when peace came the Church would be faced with a number of problems no less insistent and no less perplexing than those which she had confronted in war, and that if she was to meet them adequately she must begin to prepare at once.

The result was the appointment of the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook.

This committee was constituted on April 2, 1918, by the joint action of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches. Its purpose, as defined at the time of its appointment, was "to consider the state of religion as revealed or affected by the war with special reference to the duty and opportunity of the churches and to prepare its findings for submission to the churches." Originally consisting of nine members it has added to its number until its present membership consists of twenty-eight, representing nine different churches, as well as the two Christian associations. In addition a large number of other persons, more than one hundred in all, have served on its sub-committee, and to a still larger number it is indebted for active assistance and fruitful suggestions.

The committee was financed co-operatively by a fund of $20,000 provided by the Interchurch Emergency Campaign as part of a larger fund which it raised on behalf of the co-operating churches for the work of the General War-Time Commission of the Church and its affiliated commissions. In this campaign fourteen different churches united, a precedent which we all hope may be followed on a larger scale in connection with the proposed plans of the Federal Council.

IN PLANNING the work of the committee it speedily became clear that there were three different matters which required attention: first of all, the facts with which the church must reckon; secondly, the problems which confront her; and thirdly, the method to be followed in their solution.

In assembling the facts on which the Church must reckon, we began by studying the attitude toward religion and the Church of the young men who made up our army. These men, taken indiscriminately from all parts of the country by the military draft, constituted a cross-section of our American manhood. It seemed to us, therefore, that their opinions as to the Christian religion would give us an interesting sidelight as to what young men in general are thinking about religion and so as to the nature of the constituency with whom the Church must deal.

We realize that it would be misleading without further qualification to take the experience of these young men as typical of the country at large. The conditions under which they were living were abnormal, and what was true of them then would not necessarily have been true, or at least equally true, under other conditions. And, even if it were true, it would need to be supplemented by the experience of other groups, such as the women and that large body of men of different ages who remained at home and carried on their own work. Nevertheless we believe that the experience of these young men has much to teach us about the religion of the average American.

There is just one point in connection with the religion of these young men to which I desire to call special attention, and that is this—that the great body of truths which center about the central conception of our Lord's teaching, namely, the Kingdom of God, were conspicuous by their absence. The religion which the report describes is a purely individualistic affair. The attempt to apply religion to our relations with our fellow men which commonly goes by the name of the social gospel is not anywhere in evidence. I will not say (God forbid that I should say) that the ideal of unselfish social service was not present in the life of these young men, but I can say with confidence that it was not associated in their minds with that for which the Church of Jesus Christ stands. Here surely is a situation which needs the earnest consideration not only of every minister, but particularly of those who are shaping the program of the Church's religious education.

BUT no attempt to estimate the present state of religion can be complete which is confined to our own country. So we enlarged our survey to include the state of religion the round world over as it comes back to us through the reports of our missionaries. And here we found this notable fact, that when you take Christianity out to China, or Japan, or India, or

FROM a general survey of the problems of the Church these three stand out as of most importance, according to Dr. Brown:

1. Those which have to do with the relation between class and class.
2. Those which have to do with the relation between race and race.
3. Those which have to do with the relation between nation and nation.

How they can be solved is discussed in this very important contribution to the religious thought of the day.

the ends of the earth, and bring it to men who have never touched it before, the contrast between individual and social Christianity which we so often lament at home disappears. For the individual Gospel reacts on the social environment, and forces into the foreground of Christian thought and interest the whole group of social and economic questions which are so much in evidence in the world today.

This contrast between our home Christianity and the Christianity of the foreign field appears nowhere more clearly than in connection with the League of Nations. Here in this country we may discuss whether or no we shall go into a League of Nations. But among our missionaries as they face the great questions with which their ministry to men of other nationality confronts them, you find no such difference of opinion. They are clear that if Christianity is ever to be realized at all in its world-wide sweep and range, we must have an association of nations for mutual helpfulness and service, and they point out that the right way to approach that difficult and important question, the way that will go further than any other in bringing the peoples together into friendly association for mutual understanding and world peace is to cultivate within each country, as well as in the lives of its individual citizens, those habits of unselfish service and mutual trust which Christianity alone is able to bring to pass.

FROM this general survey of the facts I pass next to the problems which they suggest. There are three groups of problems which emerge, the gravity and significance of which it is difficult to exaggerate. There are first of all the problems which have to do with the relation between class and class; secondly, the problems which have to do with the relation between race and race; and thirdly, the problems which have to do with the relation between nation and nation. These are problems which made demands not only upon the conscience and the will, but upon the mind. They can be solved only by a careful analysis of the facts which will make clear the distinction between those disputed matters as to which men equally honest may differ and those essential questions of principle on which all Christians must stand together.

To take but a single illustration, there is the great question which has been so heatedly debated on our own Western coast as to Japanese immigration. This is a question which is inherently difficult. It presents many aspects on which men of equal honesty and good-will may differ. But the peril of the situation lies in the fact that the spirit in which these questions are approached has often been such as to contradict the central and fundamental assumption of Christianity, namely, that of the brotherhood of man.

I was listening recently to an address by an eminent American who had recently returned from Japan and had made a careful study of the Japanese question, and he expressed his conviction that there was no single point at issue between Japan and the United States which could not be dealt with in such a way as to safeguard all the interests which our friends in California regard as important, provided it was approached in the spirit of courtesy. Here the Christian Church has a plain and obvious duty, namely, to safeguard those central Christian convictions growing out of our faith in the brotherhood of man which afford the only basis on which any discussion of the questions of race, otherwise so baffling and perplexing, can be approached with any hope of success.

What is true of the relations between race and race is equally true of the relations between nation and nation. When, for example, we take up this matter of a League of Nations we find many points on which men equally honest may differ. But here again the difficulty is that these honest differences of opinion are used as a cloak for the preaching of a gospel of national selfishness and indifference against which as Christians we must protest with every power that is in us. We are disciples of the Christ who came to unite nations as well as individuals, and who in His own person transcending all difference of race or class gave reality and definiteness to that vision of the Prophet of old of a day when the ancient enemies, Egypt, Assyria and Israel, should all together be recognized as sons of God and fellow-members of His family.

IT WAS not possible for our committee to consider all these different problems with the attention which they deserved. We therefore picked out one subject for special study as an object-lesson of the way in which we believe all such questions should be approached. We chose the subject which of all others comes closest home to us in this country, and that is the subject of the attitude of the Church to the problem of industrial reconstruction. We undertook to study this question not as economists or social reformers, but as Christians.

For our point of departure we chose the plain teaching of Jesus concerning the sacredness of personality, the fact of brotherhood and the law of service, and we asked ourselves what these principles mean for the life of man today in the complex economic and industrial relationships into which our modern life plunges him. We asked ourselves what these Christian principles mean for men in the definite spheres in which they find themselves, as employers, as employees, as consumers, as investors, as citizens, and we asked ourselves finally what the Church can do in its organized capacity to make these principles effective in its own life and in the lives of the people it influences. For we were persuaded that unless the special duties which we face in these differing relationships are approached in the spirit of comradeship which Christian faith makes possible, there can be no hope for our civilization.

From this analysis of problems we were brought finally to the last of our three questions, namely, the question of the method by which these problems are finally to be solved, and that method can be summed up in a single word—through a teaching Church. And when I say a teaching Church, it must not be thought that I minimize the importance of that other primary duty of the Church, the duty of direct appeal to individuals for personal commitment to Jesus Christ. Evangelism and education—so often falsely contrasted—are in reality only two aspects of the same thing. A Church that deserves the name must be evangelistic. It is a body of men committed by their allegiance to Jesus Christ, to His program of winning the world and every man in it to the obedience of the Gospel. Education is simply a tool put into our hands by God by which the work of evangelism may be more successfully performed.

What, I repeat, is evangelism? It is the appeal of the whole Gospel to the whole man in such a form as to lead to its acceptance by the conscience and the will. And what is education but such a method of bringing the mind into contact with the truth that when the evangelist's appeal comes to the will it will be heard and answered. "What God has joined together let no man put asunder." The great task before the Church today—the task to the study of which our fourth report is devoted—is to find ways and means through which this contact may be made, and our agencies of religious education be so correlated and enlarged that the Church shall be adequately equipped for its great task of Christianizing the world.

BUT that the Church may be able thus unitedly to meet the problems of race, of nation and of class, it must be a united Church. And so in our last report we have tried to study this great movement toward Christian unity in the midst of which we find ourselves. Many different studies have been made of different aspects of the movement as they affect the local community, the administrative agencies of the Church and the denominations themselves, but this is the first attempt, so far as I know, to study the movement as a whole in all its different aspects and to analyze the questions which are at stake in the rival solutions which are proposed. Even to indicate the conclusions to which our study seems to point would be impossible within the brief limits at my disposal, but this I can say with confidence—that the movement toward Christian union is an irresistible movement which is carrying us on with a certainty like that of the tide toward the goal which God has set.

If there is one final word in which I may gather up the outcome of our joint studies concerning the Church as it faces the future it is this: we must move forward not primarily in the spirit of an "either-or" but in the spirit of a "both-and." Not the individual or the social gospel, but the Christianized individual serving a Christianized society; not evangelism or education, but the whole man, thought as well as feeling and will, brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ; not federation or union, but an inward spiritual unity.

Let us then study all the facts with an open mind that we may consecrate ourselves unreservedly to the task to which the facts when known shall point. Let us join with all men of good-will in prayer for the time when the Church and when all mankind shall be one, but in the meantime, let us determine here and now to embrace together our present opportunities and to perform our unmistakable duties.

A Boy Who Learned His Catechism

By GEORGE L. MOORE

IF ALL the boys who have learned the Catechism by heart could be assembled in one place they would make the hosts of Midian look as thin and scattered as a negro camp-meeting during a thunderstorm.

If all the boys who have carried the Catechism with them through life could be assembled in another place they would make a Corporal's Guard seem like the noon crowd at Fifth Avenue and 42nd Street. Sebastian Kresge would be one, and maybe all of them.

The Kresges of Balt Mount, Lackawanna county, Pennsylvania believed in the Catechism and believed hard enough and thoroughly enough to ground every member of the family in it. Sebastian not only learned it by heart; he learned it by head and by will.

Being versed in catechetical lore might not of itself bring success. But there is a solid, fine old granitic something about the document which is a sort of cement and rock foundation for a life. And there is vitality in it which is communicable to a business purpose and may play an unseen but vital part in building character. Sebastian S. Kresge has constructed a business success, and he has built a Christian character. The two, in his career have been knit closely together.

After attending country school, Fairview academy and a polytechnic institute, teaching school for $22 a month while at the last institution, he was still on friendly enough terms with Work to labor as a farm hand for his parents in the summer and clerk in a grocery store in the winter. He never has tried to get by with a minimum of labor.

"Mr. Kresge's success is based on industry," said a man who knows him. "He has not advanced by spasms but by steady effort."

WE HAVE in preparation now a series of short articles telling what religion means to a large number of the most important American business men. More and more these men are feeling the need of a national religious awakening, as the articles will show. They will inspire you and delight you. Certainly business and religion can mix, contrary to the loudly expressed opinions of some men who would prefer not to be hedged about in their "practical life" by too many moral or ethical restrictions.

THAT effort has gone into almost as many varied tasks as there are varieties of goods in a Kresge "Five and Ten." He led Monroe county, Pennsylvania, in bee culture for five years; he took a commercial course in a business college; he was employed in the wholesale produce business; he sold industrial insurance; canvassed, selling house furnishings; kept books for a hardware store; had a half interest in a bakery, and traveled as tinware salesman in the North Central and New England states. There were many varieties of activity, but one purpose, which was to save enough money to enter business for himself. He got together $8,000 in those twelve years.

Mr. Kresge's entry into the five-and-ten-cent-store business was when that "line" was young, and his first part in it was modest. He opened two stores, with J. G. McCrorey, one in Memphis and one in Detroit. He managed the Memphis establishment, but sold his interest in it and became sole owner of the one in Detroit. Its business waxed and waxed. A factor in the success was the introduction of a merit system for promoting employees, which was Mr. Kresge's creation, as was also a plan for co-operation between manager and buyer. The business was extended to other cities later and has been growing like Jack's beanstalk ever since. Now, there are over 150 Kresge stores throughout the country.

The Kresge building in Detroit is a monument to the steady work of a boy who learned his catechism. The Kresge home on Boston Boulevard is one of the most beautiful in Detroit. Mr. Kresge himself is a man of almost austere simplicity. He is quiet and modest, consenting with reluctance to speak in public.

PERSONAL religion is a real part of Mr. Kresge's life. As for church attendance, he belongs to that diminishing race of "Twicers" who are in their pew morning and evening. He also attends the devotional service during the week and serves faithfully on the official board. In the Methodist Centenary he had a large share. The movement had a personal commemorative significance for him, inasmuch as his grandmother was 100 years old in September, 1919.

When Prohibition was a sort of minority protest, Sebastian Kresge wasn't afraid to be closely identified with it. He has never listened to the voices which whine that "prohibition will hurt business." It hasn't hurt his and if it had, he isn't the sort of Christian who would have hedged or hemmed and hawed. In the campaign for a dry Michigan, Mr. Kresge was one of the active figures, and in the national prohibition campaign he has been conspicuous.

Moreover, he is now in the fight to stay to the finish.

"The fight isn't won now," warns Mr. Kresge. "We have the 18th amendment as a part of the Constitution, but it is the duty of every citizen to stand by its enforcement. The law must be upheld to the limit, or we are not victors."

Sebastian S. Kresge

Lycanthropy

By J. J. COOKSEY

THE wolf men who wandered in masses through southern Germany, and parts of Italy in the dark ages, were the terror of Europe. They were humans, who by a process of degradation, and mass hypnotism, displayed the predatory instincts and ravenous ferocity of the wolf. And not alone that of the wolf; but others were visibly possessed with the bestial natures of the lion and the tiger; but in the main, the wolf predominated, and the term lycanthropy covered these divers manifestations.

Europe has changed since then; and it is the opinion of her savants that animal possession has ceased to exist. This is not wholly correct, however, because I was once permitted to attend a séance—and only once—in an Arab mosque, in which I witnessed an extreme manifestation of animal possession.

Among the native friends I made in the town of Gabès, in southern Tunisia, was an old, white-bearded Moslem. In ordinary life he was as gentle as a child; frequently drank my tea, and gave me many a lesson on the correct pronunciation of Arabic gutturals, which was one of his pet studies. He was a member of the sect of the Aisawia. When he attended the ordinary séances he became quite changed; his gentle docility giving place to a fierce bestiality. Becoming very violent on one occasion, he was locked for several weeks in a room near the market-place; but being released on the occasion of a Moslem festival, I saw him devour about a third of a huge serpent, some seven feet in length.

In one of his sober moments, he invited me to accompany him to a certain mosque, where at about four o'clock on a sunny Friday afternoon, I met him and was conducted to a place of honor near the presiding sheik. The mosque was a moderate size, and there were present perhaps two hundred persons—all men. The roof of the building was partly open to the sky, and crowded around the coping of the walls were some forty women and young girls, who by their shrill cries and shouts of admiration, encouraged the men below.

The first hour of the séance followed the usual Aisawia course; first of mass hypnotism; followed by the eating of scorpions and snakes; the swallowing of broken glass and nails; and nearly nude men hurling their bare bodies upon the thorny spikes of large branches of the prickly cactus. The second part of this séance, however, is what I have set out to describe, and which cannot fail to be of interest to students of psychology, as well as to students of missions.

In the midst of the orgy there appeared to pass over the hypnotized mass a sudden pause. A quietness of a few moments ended the din. It was as though the breath of another spirit passed through the place.

And then I was startled to hear a sound I had often heard before—that of a camel, when forced to kneel for a load; throatily grumbling his guttural disgust. I looked about to discover his whereabouts, puzzled as to why a camel had been admitted to a mosque, when nearer to me came a roar as of an angry lion and there in front of me, a man was crouching as a lion ready for a spring. The transformation then became general. To the roar of the lion, and the tiger's note, was added the bellowing of bulls, the bark of the dog, and the howl of the wolf, until the place became a zoological garden of mad humans.

The pandemonium of conflicting animal sounds, emanating from beings who for the time appeared to have lost all the attributes of humanity cannot possibly be described.

I certainly should have made an effort to get away, but I knew I was tolerably safe—though the only European present—for among the crowd were many to whom I was well known, and several whom I counted as friends. So I remained until the end of the second part of the séance, which lasted about an hour.

It must not be supposed that what I have described is normal to the religion of Islam. Were it so, it would be comparatively easy to attack and confound such unmixt evil. But while Islam produces the lowest, it also produces attempts toward the highest.

The survival in it of occasional exhibitions of lycanthropy lays bare its unregenerate spirit, and vividly marks the absence in it of Him, who came "To seek and to save that which was lost."

A Race to Be Palestine's Gateway

WHAT city will become the new harbor of the new Palestine, modern counterpart of ancient Tyre, and serve as the outlet for the vast industrial and agricultural production that will result from the elaborate reconstruction program soon to be launched in Palestine?

Will it be ancient Jaffa, more modern Haifa, or a new city along the extensive Palestine coast-line, where experts determine is the most favorable location for the big port that will handle the large volume of business following the political and economic restoration of Palestine?

A regular Chamber of Commerce war has developed between Jaffa and Haifa in the race to land the modern harbor and with it the opportunity to become the leading city of the entire Near East, Neithen.

That Palestine is not entirely the old-fashioned lagging land, which is the general opinion of it, but that it is being rapidly modernized through active commercial enterprise, is shown by the spirited bidding of Jaffa and Haifa for the port, for which plans already have been projected by the Zionist Organization of America, through its Society of Engineers, by the British Government, French engineers and private individuals in Palestine.

Each city organized a Chamber of Commerce last summer, the principal work of which was to convince the various organizations interested that it was the logical city to become the gateway of Palestine and its vast fertile hinterland, including the rich plains of Mesopotamia.

So far Haifa has somewhat of an advantage over its more ancient rival. A recent cable message from London reported that the British Government was planning harbor improvements at Haifa costing $5,000,000, while another London report stated that the Anglo-Persian Oil Company is to use Haifa as the terminus of a pipe-line between 350 and 400 miles in length, to give it a direct Mediterranean outlet for its products.

Another boost for Haifa has resulted from the organization of a water farm and school for fishermen at Tantura near Haifa, on land and in buildings donated by Baron James de Rothschild, which will make Haifa the center of the comparatively new fishing industry in Palestine. The fishing industry has never been developed there, but already a commission is at work to make the most out of an industry which has great possibilities because of Palestine's extensive coast-line.

THE rivalry between Jaffa and Haifa over the harbor assumes a timely importance because the construction of an adequate port will be the first big job to be tackled in the reconstruction program to be carried out by the Zionist organization of America through its $10,000,000 restoration campaign.

Plans drawn up by engineering experts of the Zionist Society of Engineers call for an initial expenditure of $4,250,000, with which to build sea-walls, jetties, piers, etc., the fundamental requirements of a harbor, to be followed in time by the construction of open piers, quays, a lighthouse and dry dock.

In connection with the harbor construction, the society plans to connect the port with all parts of Palestine, through a network of railroad lines, and to develop a stone quarry with which to provide materials for harbor improvements. Their plans call for an appropriation of $10,000,000 to establish a merchant marine to provide adequate shipping facilities to handle Palestine's increased commercial development.

Both Jaffa and Haifa are ignored by harbor plans proposed by S. Jabnioli, well-known public figure in Palestine, who in his development projects declares that the first step is in the creation of a national economic center in the south of Palestine by the construction of a new city on the sea-coast with a harbor.

The waterfront at Jaffa, ancient port of the Holy Land, always is picturesque and colorful, though it leaves much to be desired in the way of modern facilities. Passengers and freight must be transferred from the steamships to small boats in order to reach the shore

"This new town must be connected by a new railroad line with Eastern Palestine, Jerusalem and the Dead Sea and this new railroad line should further extend from Jericho to Tiberias and Upper Galilee," he explained. "Branch lines and motor and wagon services should connect the new harbor with all of Southern Palestine."

Jabnioli plans to increase the importance of the harbor by irrigating the land behind it, stimulating cattle breeding, poultry and bee-keeping, agricultural cultivation, and afforestation, and by the creation of bathing and health resorts along the Dead Sea, utilizing its medical springs.

The Jaffa Chamber of Commerce, as one of the opening broadsides in its campaign, gives the following reasons why it should land the harbor:

"Jaffa lies almost in the middle of the Palestine coastline, while Haifa is situated in the north. Thus goods can be better distributed from and collected at Jaffa. Moreover the output of the hinterland of Haifa is unimportant as compared with that of Jaffa. The harbor of Haifa was to a very great extent up to now fed by grain from the Hauran, but supposing a tariff wall is established in Syria, what will then happen to Haifa? On the other hand the mineral wealth of the region of the Dead Sea and the Jordan valley is very great and here again it is Jaffa, not Haifa, through which the manufactured commodities and minerals will be expected."

After pointing out that Jaffa exceeded Haifa in imports and exports before the war, the Jaffa Chamber of Commerce declares that another consideration which should bring the harbor to Jaffa is the fact that practically all tourists pass through Jaffa and that the number of tourists will reach 250,000 annually.

THE Department of Trade and Industry of the Zionist Organization declares that the foregoing views are one-sided and mentions the fact that Haifa is the terminus of the Hedjaz railroad and the gateway of the fertile valley of the Esdraelon, and that it possesses a natural first-class harbor, while an artificial harbor will have to be built at Jaffa.

Engineering experts who have surveyed the possibilities of a harbor along the Palestine coast are inclined to favor Haifa. By dredging the bay, which is ten miles long and three miles wide, experts point out that vessels of 30-foot draft could be accommodated at a pier there and vessels of greater draft out in the bay, which would take care of any vessels now plying the Eastern Mediterranean.

There is ample room between the slopes of Mount Carmel and the sea for railroad sidings, custom sheds, grain elevators, docks and all other equipment of a great port.

With an expenditure of $10,000,000 it is believed that a long breakwater could be built to break up the troublesome southwest seas.

Haifa is not only the logical outlet for Palestine, but also for Damascus, the great granary of the Hauran and the future port of Mesopotamia. Foreign trade experts claim it can be made not only the front door of Palestine, but of the entire Near East.

The two principal railroad lines of Palestine now converge on Haifa. They are the line from Gaza, now joined to Egypt by a British army railroad, and the line from Damascus which rounds the southern end of Galilee and crosses Palestine in a due west line.

European capitalists believe that Damascus is capable of great commercial development if given an adequate port, such as Haifa could be made to provide. Beirut, its present outlet, is connected with Damascus by a narrow gauge railroad, the capacity of which is too limited to permit of great development of Damascus. The railroad from Haifa to Damascus can be made to handle any amount of freight and deliver it to the docks in Haifa 10 hours after it leaves Damascus.

IF a railroad line is built across the Syrian desert from Kut-El-Amara to join the Damascus-Haifa line below Damascus, Haifa will become the greater outlet for fertile Mesopotamia, it is pointed out. Plans calling for this emphasize that the construction of this connecting line offers no engineering difficulties.

The plain of Esdraelon, one of the most fertile sections in all Palestine, is Haifa's hinterland. Its development will also make Haifa the center of the richest agricultural district in Palestine.

In case Haifa is selected for the harbor site, the big jump in its population from 20,000 could be accommodated up and down the bay and along the slopes of Mount Carmel.

Thousands of Jews in the Far East are anxiously waiting for the opening of Palestine, so that they may make their homes there, according to Samuel Mason, Jewish Relief Commissioner to Siberia. Mr. Mason says the intense desire to emigrate to Palestine is not due to propaganda, but it is an expression of deeply ingrained Jewish sentiment. He reports that Zionist aspirations have been endorsed by the Governments of China, Japan and Siberia, and that the Zionist organization has been allowed to assist Jewish prisoners of war in Siberian prison camps. He adds:

"The Jewish people in these countries are roughly divided into five classes—investors, traders, farmers, laborers and idealists. The traders are largely men with wide export and business experience which they propose to utilize in Palestine.

"The farmers want to convert their Russian currency into agricultural implements as soon as they know that land is available for them. The laborers are willing to do any kind of work. The idealists want to dedicate their services to the country in any capacity.

"The investors are usually elderly persons whose faith in the future of Palestine is firm, and who are willing to stake their capital on any development approved by the Zionist Organization."

In America also the Zionists are very active and the funds which they are raising for Jewish colonization in the Holy Land will be an important factor in the effort to restore Palestine to a position of prosperity and power.

Age in the Pulpit

At What Year Does the Minister's Value to His Parish Begin to Decline and What Are the Relative Advantages of Youth?

(Based on Letters)

By A MINISTER

I REMEMBER when I was a boy, the benign, lovable sixty-five-year old pastor of one of our three small town churches. He was the "marrying" and "burying" parson for the entire western part of the county. He was the friend of every girl, and the confidant of every boy; the fishing companion of all the men, and, in general, the best-loved person in the community. His congregations were as varied as the character of the population and, while many of his friends were, frankly, uninterested in the Church and what the Church stood for, they were constant in attendance at services because they "wanted to encourage the preacher."

That was a pseudo-cynical pose, however; they really went to his church because they enjoyed the sermons, they drew vastly to their own good from the sincerity and unselfishness of the pastor, and the spirit of Christ that filled the meeting-place when the preacher got into the pulpit.

I remember one man, frowned on as the town atheist, who went out of his way every Monday to hand a dollar to the pastor, in constant apology for his absence from the congregation the preceding day, but actually for the smile and the handshake and the word of appreciation that would be sure to accompany his contribution—and I can testify to the benevolent influence that surrounded this man the whole day after his meeting with the clergyman.

But the pastor was sixty-five. His hair and his beard were white and his broad shoulders were slightly stooped. More than once he was seen to nod in his chair during the singing of the anthem.

So it was that our group of boys, on the way to school one morning, learned that Doctor S.—had been succeeded by a young man, fresh from a big theological school, and that the pulpit on the next Sunday would be filled by youth, energy and a new aspiration and—had we but known—a new theology. Of course, the auditorium was filled to greet the successor. The town weighed him and solemnly shook its head. The next week there was an occasional empty seat. The week following the empty spaces were more pronounced. There is no denying the young minister's brilliancy of mind, his earnestness and his love for his calling, but he lacked personality when contrasted with the man whose place he had taken. In a word, he was found wanting. He made a brave fight for six months or so, but, discouraged and broken in spirit, he asked to be relieved of his duties.

So, Dr. S.—came back to his own.

HERE is just one little incident out of an experience that has come to all too many ministers, who have found gray hair and halting step growing with their years. It is, of course, one of the tragedies of life, no less in other callings than in the ministers', that "youth must be served," but the case of Dr. S.—shows that not always will youth be served well by climbing with its energies and ambitions over the shoulders of age and experience. The contrast is not to the favor of youth.

So one of the most difficult questions before the Church today is what shall be done with the aged minister. A writer in a well-known monthly publication seriously, though somewhat facetiously, asks this question: "Shall we chloroform our old preachers?" In answer to that, a minister in Virginia, who has had his own severe race with the more youthful men in the Church, says:

It is particularly unfortunate that in these modern times a man's usefulness and efficiency should be measured by the number of years he has lived. An eminent physician in New York City was recently asked: "When is a man old?" His reply was, "When his blood pressure reaches 150." At what age he reaches that blood pressure depends upon his habits of life. Some men are old at fifty while others are young at seventy-five. There is no justice or fairplay in ranking people by the number of their years. People ought to be judged old or young by their mental condition, their attitude toward life, by their sprightly or inane thought. If they face toward youth and optimism, if they are hopeful and buoyant and cheerful and enthusiastic, they ought to be classed among the young, no matter what their years may be. Give our elders a chance. Surely experience and other qualifications ought to count for something in the equation. No man of energy and mental capacity and self-respect wants to be shelved or made a dependent. Why should our elders be shoved aside to make room for the younger and less experienced ministers of the Gospel? Suppose this course had been pursued in the case of such of our leaders as Barnet Grimsley and J. L. Burrows and J. B. Jeter and Wm. E. Hatcher, and Thos. S. Dunaway and J. B. Hawthorne and scores of others.

Said an active and brainy man of seventy-five years recently: "For forty years I was a bread-winner, and during that time I had filled positions of trust that required intellect and capacity and honesty and can say without boasting that I always gave satisfaction until my hair became gray and my face slightly wrinkled. Since that time, which is sure to come to every one who lives long enough, I have lost my position and sought work in vain. My eye is not dim nor my natural force abated, yet invariably in offering my services, I have been told, either kindly, or rudely that my age makes me ineligible. This man and his family must either starve or become dependents. I repeat with added emphasis, give our elders a square deal that their way instead of being a Via Dolorosa may be the way of hope and cheerfulness and usefulness and efficiency."

This minister, early in April, became a member of the Christian Herald Prayer League. At the time he wrote:

I am glad to become a member of your Prayer League and will join with all who are connected with it in prayer for all the causes mentioned in the Christian Herald. I am a firm believer in prayer, and would ask in my own behalf the petitions of all, that the Lord would direct me to a useful and successful field of labor. I have been pastor of several country churches down here in Virginia, and the Lord has greatly blessed my labors, but as the churches were anxious to secure the services of a young man (I am in my sixty-eighth year) I resigned and have since found it very hard to get a call to another field on account of my age, although I am in good health and as capable of efficient service as ever in my ministry of about forty years, as pastor of various Baptist churches in Kentucky, Montana, Colorado, Nebraska, Maryland, and Virginia. I really think that experience and other qualifications ought to count for something in the equation. I earnestly solicit prayer that I may serve the Lord with all my powers of mind and body and soul in some settled field of labor.

TO WHICH Mr. A. C. Baker, secretary of the Prayer League, replied:

I am in receipt of your favor of the 10th, which I have read carefully, and which has roused my deep sympathy. I can not understand this craze for the young men, particularly in fields where old men's counsel and ripe experience are more advantageous than those of men under forty. I do not look upon you as an old man, even though you say you are sixty-eight. No man is old, no matter what his age, who is physically and mentally alert, and you seem to be both. I wish I could do something practical, in the way of helping you secure a new charge. Of course I can do something, and perhaps it is the best that any one can do, and that is to pray for your material as well as your spiritual welfare, and in this the mission and its congregation will join me, at the next eight services.

Our pastor and president, the Rev. John G. Hallimond, D.D., is a man just your age, and instead of our looking upon him as old and wanting to get a younger man, we are praying that he be preserved to us for many years, for the reason that he is an inspiration to us all, and the guiding hand of this mission. He is 90 per cent. of its initiative and efficiency. It does seem so silly that people should look upon you in the light they evidently do.

I had hoped that the war would alter things in that respect, because when the young men became scarce we turned to old men in all lines of work, and we found that they were efficient, and what they lacked in speed, they made up in steadiness.

So you see where I stand in regard to you—my blessings go to you and with you, and may God reward you, in the near future, with a charge in which you can be a blessing and an inspiration to all with whom you come in contact.

A fourth letter completes the correspondence to date:

Your very kind letter is received and read with appreciative interest. I am hoping that the Lord will answer the united prayers of the League in my behalf as well as of others who have made known their requests. It is a comfort to know that we can, though separated by long distances, join in our petitions to the Throne of Grace in behalf of these several and worthy cases.

I do not remember that I mentioned to you that I was ordained to the Gospel ministry at the Hampden Baptist Church in Baltimore, July 4, 1877, and have been continuously in the pastorate (in several states) until November of last year, when I offered my resignation here to give place to a young man who has not yet finished his course of study at college. Since then, with the assistance of friends, I have sought in vain to reenter the pastorate. Blessings upon the work of the Bowery Mission.

This brings to mind two questions: "At what age does a minister's usefulness end?" and "Which would be preferred in charge of a parish—the young man with fire and energy and the knowledge of life that is, more or less, confined to the text-book, or the man of age and experience whose knowledge of life comes from having lived it?"

It is an interesting question and one that the readers of the Christian Herald are invited to write to us about, good-night. And tomorrow—"she smiled brightly down into the eager little face, "tomorrow I'll read you a long, long story! And now," she pressed a soft kiss upon his cheek, "now run away and play. Mother's busy!"

The child turned toward the door, his book still in his hand. But, as he was going he spoke to his mother, and his voice was not in the least saucy—it was only very wistful.

"I'll go an' play," he told her, "but you won't read me a story tomorrow. You'll forget 'r sumpin'." I know!" And he went out closing the door softly—as he had been taught to close doors—behind him.

I had always rather admired Mrs. Smith. On my infrequent visits to her home I had always wondered how she was able to arrange her affairs so smoothly—how she always managed to have her rooms in order, and her prettiest frock on, and her meals so well served. In these days of hit-or-miss housekeeping she had seemed rather a marvel to me. And her youth and prettiness had helped me in the forming of my opinion—had helped tremendously! But her little boy, Sonny, with one wistful sentence, had done much to shatter the bubble of illusion that I had built around her.

"You won't read me a story tomorrow," he had said. "You'll forget or sumpin'." I know!"

MRS. SMITH is not the only mother who, in my hearing, has made some promise to her child—some promise that she does not intend to keep. There are many women who speak lightly of reading stories, and going on picnics, and making visits to the Zoo—women who promise delightful treats and who forget, or regard as unimportant, those promises. Unfortunately children are much less apt to forget than grown-up folk! A child may count the hours, even the minutes, until some wonderful party—and then, when the party does not materialize, he is often broken-hearted.

I have at times heard mothers bemoan the fact that their children are not truthful. "They don't seem to have any conscience about keeping to the things they say," one mother told me. "I have two girls and a boy, you know. And they fib quite outrageously. What on earth I'm going to do with them, I can't imagine! They get worse all the time, instead of better!"

I knew this mother more intimately than I had known Mrs. Smith. And so I spoke right out.

"I wonder," I asked, "if you've ever told your children any untruths? You know that children are wonderful little imitators!"

The mother, for a moment, was inclined to be offended—despite the fact that we were intimate friends—and then she decided to treat my remark humorously. And she laughed.

WHEN I was calling on Mrs. Smith, last Tuesday, her little boy came into the room with a large picture-book in his hand. He is a dear little boy, almost six years old, and he loves his books, with their fascinating stories and their bright illustrations. After he had greeted me in his almost formal, old-fashioned way, he went over to his mother's side and leaned against her knee. It was quite obvious that he wanted something. And, when she had finished what she was saying at the moment, Mrs. Smith drew him close and looked down into his sober little face.

"What is it, sonny," she questioned gently, "did you want to speak to mother?"

The little boy raised his wide eyes to her face.

"When the lady goes," he said, "an' it's my bed-time, will you come into my room and read me a story?"

Mrs. Smith looked at me, with laughing eyes, over her child's head.

"My son," she said, "isn't suggesting that you go home—it's only his own way of talking!"

The little boy, his question unanswered, was tugging at her sleeve.

"Mother," he asked again, "Mother! When it's my bed-time will you read me a story?"

Mrs. Smith's pretty face was vaguely perplexed as she answered.

"Why, sonny," she said slowly, "I don't believe that I'll have time to read to you this evening. Daddy and I are dining out—and I'll have to be dressing when it's your bed-time. But I'll come in to kiss you

Part Three

CHAPTER VI

RUTH looked into David Blair's eyes, shining, filmed with despair, alternating between hope divine and fear that was death and annihilation, and her heart ached so that her throat felt a queer constriction. To be a woman was to be dumb in such crises. There was nothing she could offer to the man who withheld his hope from her—even though she knew, she knew so well!

"Then, let us hope that it will not come back," she said, at last, feeling a queer effort to speak even such a weak, worthless platitude.

He took her hands in his own, stooped and kissed the rosy, fluttering palms, reverently, as if he were a subject and she his queen. Then, smiling, such a brave, pitiful smile, he turned away and left her alone beside the spring.

"It is a shameful thing to be a woman, and tongue-tied," wept Ruth, thinking hotly, wrathfully, of her impotence. She who had first from sheer pity tended this man when she imagined him an object of terror, felt herself longing to comfort him with all the intensity of her nature. Ruth did not try to analyze her feelings toward the writer any further; she just ached to help him.

"I wish I were rich," mourned Ruth, as her slow footsteps turned homeward from this interview, "maybe I could be something to help in getting his book printed, but he'd never let me, never in the world!"

If she had money she could not help the man she pitied—she would say no more, even to herself, than just that—pitied till her heart ached with the fervor of it.

It was now September, and she had spent a whole summer at Hideaway House, learning rapidly to know and like her neighbors, to love some of them; to worry over their problems—Miss Emily's, Tom Auld's, Mary Smithers's, whom Donaldson was avowedly courting, as well as the incomparably greater one of the writer man.

"It seems to me that I've lived a lifetime here, instead of a few short months," mused Ruth, as she watched Ellen Hawtree, overalls slipped over her pink chambray and a handkerchief tied about her head, shoveling coal into the furnace. Ruth had protested that this was too hard for Ellen, but the latter had scoffed at the thought.

"Hard as I worked to Smitherses, this is play, jest play," said Ellen; "and I do love to think I'm helpin' to keep you warm, Miss Ruth, though this snap ain't cold—we aim to try out the furnace, that's all. Miss Em'ly, now, she ain't had as much heat as this in her house in a whole winter, that she ain't. I wish Miss Em'ly could get good and warm for a whole winter. She's down with the rheumatiz, I heard tell, when I went to the village this morning."

"And school begins next week!" said Ruth, in dismay, "what in the world will she do! Ellen, I'll offer to substitute for her, if she'll let me."

BUT when she went hurriedly down to see Miss Emily, whom she found crouching over a tiny fire in her stove, with her right hand done up in red flannel, it was too late.

Miserably the little woman, down whose withered cheeks the slow tears of age were creeping, handed her friend a letter, a letter from the trustees of the district school telling Miss Emily that her services were no longer needed!

Difficult studies, new methods, her own age and ailments, made it necessary, they very much regretted, to secure the services of a new teacher, one able to cope with the strenuous duties of the school. A young man had been found who was ready to assume his duties when school opened.

"Oh, Miss Emily!" breathed Ruth, "would it be any use, I wonder, for me to see the trustees? I will gladly substitute for you until you get well."

"I thank you, Miss Ruth, for thinking of me," she said quietly but firmly, rather haughtily indeed, "but I certainly don't aim to marry any man who—who——"

A Heart-Warming Five-Part Story

By ANNE McQUEEN

Illustrated by M. L. Greer

"No, no, child, bless you for wanting to do it! You see, they wanted you, at first. Abner Green told 'em he knew you wouldn't have it, not take it from me. He's a good man, Abner, is. So—so they just went and hired a man. And winter is coming fast, and—and I've lost my position!"

Her voice quavered pitifully; Ruth, even in her stress of pity, noted Miss Emily's choice of words. She still remembered to use her careful, old-time English—it was not a "job" she had lost, but a "position."

"Then come and live with me," was on Ruth's lips, but she withheld the impulsive words, well knowing that Miss Emily would never accept charity till the county officers were forced to come and take her to the poor-farm, for she doubted very much if Miss Emily, for all her frugal years of saving, had even enough money to enter an old ladies' home.

So she made no further comment; she merely built a brisk fire of the little woman's cherished fuel, made a heartening cup of tea; and, vowing that she herself was extremely thirsty, persuaded her hostess to drink a cup with her—for politeness' sake.

Though she had to force herself to swallow it, the hot tea did Miss Emily good; it roused her from her apathy of sorrow.

"Now don't you worry too much, Miss Emily; there'll be a way out," Ruth said cheerfully, as she

How the Story Began

RUTH CARFAX is brought up by her grandfather, a wonderful companion, after all the others of her family are lost in a sea disaster when she is ten. Her early memories are of a life of luxury and wealth, but in her grandfather's big, dark house in the city all is simplicity and plainness and their fondest dream is of a return to the quaint little country house in which he had begun his married life. As Ruth is finishing college her grandfather dies, but she determines to carry out their plans and, accompanied by Mr. Gary, the family lawyer, she goes to the farm, which is managed by Donaldson, a man of miserly disposition. Ruth soon is known as "the comfort-bringer" among her new neighbors and enters fully into their joys and sorrows. David Blair, long denied opportunity and recovering from illness, has rooms in the Auld house nearby while writing his first book; and Ruth, without his knowledge, prepares his food. The manuscript finished and mailed to a publisher, he tells Ruth of his trials and ambitions and declares all his hopes will be wrecked if the book is rejected.

washed and put away the cups and saucers. "Now I'm going to Mrs. Green's, and see if she has any of her famous liniment made—the kind you said always did your rheumatism good. Just remember, don't worry!"

"The blessed child," murmured Miss Emily as she watched through her window the tall, lithe young figure on its way; "she always seems to bring comfort, wherever she goes. But the Lord only knows how there'll be a way out!"

MRS. ABNER GREEN, busy housewife, was stirring her apple-butter in a big brass kettle when Ruth arrived; Mrs. Green's butter was famous, and she had given the recipe to Ruth, whose cooking, Mrs. Green stated with candor, "fair out-did her own"—the pupil had improved on the teacher's handiwork!

"Yes, honey, I knowed all about poor Miss Emily bein' turned out in her old age," said Mrs. Green, gloomily. "Twas to be expected, though. Rheumatiz in your right hand ain't to be recommended in teachin'. Liniment? Yes, I made some ready for her, and if so be you'll call by and take it on your way back, it'll save me a trip. And now, seein' we are on the subject o' troubles, here comes Mary Smithers to me, early this mornin', with news that her pap says she's got to marry that old skinflint of a Donaldson! What 'ye think o' that?"

"I think it simply outrageous—and she sha'n't do it!" declared Ruth, hotly. "I—I will just forbid Donaldson to do any such thing!"

And then it struck her as utterly impossible for her to forbid Donaldson to marry whom he wished, and she stared at Mrs. Green with incredulous horror on her face.

"Yes, we'd all like to forbid him, child," agreed Mrs. Green dryly, "but you see this is a free country—as old man Smithers and Donaldson seem to realize. And that poor, spiritless Mary, without a will of her own to say no! Beats my time how poor-spirited some girls are."

"Poor Tom," mourned Ruth, "what in the world will he do?"

Mrs. Green stirred her apple-butter with vigor—quite as if she were slapping some imaginary head, in fact. "Why, Tom's as poor-spirited as Mary," she declared, indignantly; "no spunk between 'em. I don't see as how we can do anything about it, me and you," she averred, gloomily, "but just let 'em slide, as Father says. Poor Mary, she'll sup sorrow by the ladleful, I calc'late, takin' up with that old skinflint."

But Ruth could not be willing to let things slide; she would see Donaldson, she would see Smithers—and Tom. And if it were possible, she would persuade Mary and Tom to elope. And she would give him Donaldson's place as her superintendent, or farm manager; certainly he could get along.

BUT when she saw Donaldson, and laid the case before him, the fact of Mary's and Tom's loving each other, and the girl being forced into a loveless marriage by her father, Ruth met with cold comfort from the canny Scotchman.

"Marriage is just a question o' convenience, mem," quoth Donaldson, coolly, as he picked the ripe apples from a tree, carefully sorting them into different baskets, according to their size. "I will no say the lass may not be thinkin' she hae some foolishness in her mind regarding young Auld, but that'll pass, that'll pass; I'm no worryin' maeself about sich nonsense as young folk's havers."

"Very well, Donaldson," she said with heat; "do any such outrageous thing as marry a girl who does not love you, who is being forced to marry you, and—and you will leave my employ at once. I will not keep you on my farm under any consideration."

"Hoots, young leddy, not so fast, not so fast!" quoth Donaldson, smiling grimly and triumphantly; "for there's a contract, mind ye, locked up in me kist, which gies me five years as your manager. I

The Colombian Treaty

THE treaty with Colombia, which had been shelved time and again for various reasons, has at last been ratified by the United States Senate. Foremost among the advocates of ratification were several members of that august body who had formerly opposed the treaty for what they regarded as valid reasons. It was resented by the friends of Theodore Roosevelt as a reflection upon his administration, and a virtual admission of wrong done by the United States to the Isthmian republic—a wrong which the Treaty proposed to compound by the payment of money.

With the new administration there has come a new light in the Senate. Mr. Lodge now regards the Treaty as part of "a great major policy," which he believes will be of importance to the whole American hemisphere, being in the interest of national security and the safety of the Canal. It was explained that on these grounds the President had asked for ratification.

So the Treaty is now ratified and the debt of honor acknowledged and ordered to be liquidated in six instalments. It contains, however, no apology to Colombia, the payment of $25,000,000 being regarded as at once acknowledgment and solatium. As the Treaty now stands, it vests in the United States the title to the Panama Canal, without incumbrance, and grants to Colombia the right of transport for troops, war munitions and other large grants and concessions, and authorizes the payment to that republic of the indemnity. The Treaty looks forward to the reestablishment of the friendly relations between the two governments that existed prior to the dispute at the time of the revolution which arose out of the secession of Panama before actual construction of the Canal was begun.

There are several important considerations which were touched upon during the debate, and may be indicated as good and substantial reasons for ratification at this time. Senator Lodge pointed out "the larger aspects" of the question, and the need of "international amity," not forgetting the fact that Colombia has coasts on two oceans, with good harbors, and vast, undeveloped resources. Just how these reasons may strike the general reader, is an open question. We can not believe they point to exploitation. One main point, however, is clear: The long-deferred act of justice has been done, the awkward situation relieved, and both republics have now an excellent opportunity for the renewal of friendly relations and mutual appreciation.

The Family Altar

THE number of letters on the subject of the Family Altar has been large and gratifying, especially those which have related the experience of establishing the custom on the day of the marriage service. It has not been possible to publish all the letters received, but this is an acknowledgment to all who have sent a response, with thanks for the helpfulness of the replies and a hope that very many families in the churches may begin the service, taking notes, possibly from the way in which different families observe the Altar in their homes.

There is one comment which nearly all these letters make, and that is the testimony to the effect that the Family Altar has been of the greatest value in the home life, and is regarded by those who have made it a habit as fundamental in the training of children. It is also very emphatically said by nearly all the writers that the home life of this country can not be what it should be without this Altar established. Let all the pastors of all the churches make a special effort to influence their people to set up this Altar. Especially would we suggest that whenever the pastor celebrates the marriage ceremony, he urge the newly married couple to make the family altar the first sacred custom in the new home.

What of the Future Ministry?

Amherst, Mass.—Of the graduating class at Amherst College this year, only one student will enter the ministry. Fifty-four will enter business and twenty-seven will take up law, medicine and other professions.

IF THE above news item is a fair sample of conditions in other colleges, it raises several interesting questions.

First—If the American college is not training men for the ministry, where will they come from? The demand for thoroughly educated men for the pulpit is stronger than ever. But if the colleges cease to inspire men for the ministry, how will this demand be met?

Second—What are the compelling motives that urge young college men to enter business in such large numbers? Is it the financial "pull" or the better opportunity to use educated brains?

Third—Are college men very generally discouraged from entering the ministry because of the small and uncertain salaries, or because they do not want to spend their lives and their talents in fighting for an ecclesiastical existence with denominations?

Fourth—What percentage of American fathers and mothers, even among church members, are encouraging their sons to enter the ministry? How many of them are actually discouraging any ambitions looking towards such a choice?

Fifth—What inspiration is being offered by teachers or professors in our schools and colleges to help the student body to a vision of service in the Church?

Sixth—Is the lack of interest in the ministry as a life work due to the philosophic or secular teaching in our schools and colleges?

These questions are suggested by the press item as above. They are not a reflection on the particular college named. The same conditions seem to be true in all colleges. They are conditions that ought to give church people very serious thought. What of the future ministry?

Off the Track!

WHEN a pastor diverges from the straight path of Gospel proclamation and ventures into the byways in the search for topics that seem attractive, he need not be surprised if what he seeks should prove deceptive, an illusive will-o-the-wisp. Endeavors to startle the world with sensational topics as substitutes for the broad, inclusive Gospel, which goes home to the hearts of all sorts and conditions of men, usually end in disappointment. We have known ministers who endeavored to win approval by making the pulpit the coursing ground where philosophic discussion, travelogues, the latest popular novel, and an occasional excursion into scientific fields were served up by way of variety. But the net outcome was in almost every case a distinct loss of spiritual power in their churches, and unavailing regrets afterward over the waste of precious opportunities.

Now we hear of a Western minister who, probably having read of Professor Einstein's theory of spacial relativity, decided to stir up his congregation with a sermon on science. He told them that this old world of ours is speeding to destruction, and that the final catastrophe may come in any one of nine different ways. There might be a sudden change of the earth's axis, which would drown the entire population; or we might collide with a dead star and be smashed into fragments; or the earth's internal fires might fail and the water and atmosphere being absorbed, all life would quickly perish; or the tail of a comet might envelope the globe, asphyxiating its whole population. There were other equally brilliant possibilities of extinction which he pointed out; but the main fact to be kept steadily in view, in his judgment, was that the earth is traveling straight toward Hercules at the inconceivable speed of 600,000 miles a day, and when the distance was accomplished, it would be the end.

There may have been some thoughtful hearer in the preacher's audience who was reminded of Goldsmith's lines on the village teacher:

"And still he taught and still the wonder grew,
That one small head could carry all he knew."

With due respect for those ministers who seem impelled by some mysterious fascination to dip into science, we think it might be well, before inflicting their conclusions on a defenseless audience, to submit them to some one who has made science a really serious study. They will find in that particular field even more diversity of opinion than there is among the religious sects themselves. We are reminded of a well-known preacher, who confessed to us that he was once squarely cornered on a point in astronomy. "I had referred in my sermon," he explained, "to the immense distances in the stellar heavens. 'The planet Neptune,' I told them impressively, 'is 2,629,000,000 miles distant from the earth.' I paused, and a man jumped up in one of the pews near the platform. I nodded recognition, and he suddenly put the question: 'Why, how do you get those amazing figures? How can you prove—?' 'I assert it,' said I with as much dignity as the case warranted; 'disprove it, if you can!' Then the man sat down and I resumed my sermon; but ever since that time, I leave scientific estimates and calculations alone."

He was a wise preacher in his day and generation, and we commend his example to those who are over-keen to seize upon the dominant topic of the moment and philosophize in rhetorical phrases which are meant to be profoundly impressive but are too often the reverse. You may dazzle with eloquence, bewilder with scientific speculations and measure swords in sectarian disputes, but souls are never won, save by the lifting up of the Cross, which is the highest honor and duty of the Christian ministry.

Training for Immortality

TO MOST minds today, the "larger life" is an unattainable idealism. Even among the great majority of professing Christians, it means much more than a life of good deeds and admirable character. Those who grasp its full significance are apt to be regarded as following a shadow, or at least something so remote and intangible as to be beyond definition. Yet there are illumined souls who, having absolute faith in immortality, have become convinced that the "larger life" should begin here and now. They look upon it as the duty of every Christian man or woman to strive to so expand the spiritual scope of life here that it may conform and co-ordinate more and more with the spiritual life beyond. They are training for immortality, which is "the gift of God," through Jesus Christ.

John Franklin Genung, late Professor of Biblical and Literary Interpretation in Amherst College, was one of the rare souls who held this belief as the most precious part of his whole spiritual experience. A firm believer in the Gospel, and holding the Bible, "in spite of all the monographs of science and philosophy, to be the real textbook of life," he was convinced that the one great duty of every believer in immortality is to raise manhood life to its highest power, now, while the opportunity lies open to us. His spiritual experiences after reaching that decision, have just been issued in a book entitled "The Life Indeed," being one of a series of volumes by different writers, in commemoration of the centenary of the famous college. The manuscript was discovered among his papers after his death, and was found to be a notable record of trial, struggle and success—a fitting last word and a testimony of the deeper and wider spiritual experience which the Christian world would welcome.

Contrasted with the scale to which the Bible conceptions are conformed, the natural scale he found to be petty and puny. "It made death and the survival of death, not life and the ennobling of life, the unit of measure . . . It should be the scale of life, not of death; of life as guided by God and His recognized will." He became convinced that "it is only along this line that life and immortality, in the only sense worthy of the large possibilities of manhood, can come to light. Manhood must rise to a higher order and standard of being, co-ordinated with the life of the spirit. 'Why,' he asks, 'should the spirit have to postpone its life until the body dies?' 'God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him.' What we owe to men, to life, to the world, is our just duty, what is due. We owe to mankind simply all that we are. Inasmuch as we have or have not done it, turns the scale.

"This spirit of life," he explains, is moving freely as "faith which worketh by love," redeems the whole man. No accumulated debt of the lower nature can overbalance it; it is what the Scripture calls the power of an endless life. It is Christ who redeems us, and other foundation can no man lay. That is profoundly true. But as our study has revealed Christ in idea, as the perfect manhood after which the spirit of man has dimly struggled, the idea of the redemption He works is correspondingly enlarged and clarified. We have, in fact, found the essential Christ.

Professor Genung's book traverses a whole course of study of the Larger Life. In conclusion he writes: "God is love," says the Bible's deepest and ripest definition of Him. The problem of being at one with Him, then, is the problem of being at one with love, in all the involvements that life has created for it. It goes beyond passive innocence into active, holy, vital work and sacrifice; not the sheer blind sacrifice of abnegation, but the vigorous, voluntary, fruitful sacrifice, of effecting a union of human hearts and human lives in one spirit of love. It goes beyond the shrewdness and studied order of wisdom, of which the world is full, committing itself fearlessly, patiently, hopefully to activities which are the supreme unwisdom of men, but which prove through time, to be the far-reaching wisdom and power of God."

House Votes $396,000,000 for Navy; Senate Adopts Peace Resolution

DETERMINED efforts to force the inclusion in the naval appropriation bill of provisions for an international discussion of naval disarmament were rejected and the measure, carrying a total grant of $396,000,000, was passed finally in the House by a vote of 212 to 15.

This vote, however, does not represent the real sentiment of the House on disarmament, for the defeat of the disarmament amendments was traceable directly to an assurance by Representative Mondell, Republican leader, that a call for a disarmament conference will be issued before the close of the present session. He said the condition and situation of foreign relationships did not yet warrant such a move, and asserted that to attach conditions to American naval appropriations would delay rather than hasten disarmament negotiations. This statement was brought out by an amendment offered by Representative Connally of Texas that no part of the $90,000,000 for ship construction should be expended until after the President had called an international conference. Another amendment which was defeated would have authorized the President to suspend or curtail the appropriation at his discretion. One important change in the bill was that the appropriation shall be expended only on vessels now under construction.

In the Senate, the Knox resolution declaring a state of peace between the United States and the Central Powers was taken up and adopted by a vote of 49 to 23 under an agreement between the opposing party leaders to get it out of the way. The resolution was attacked vigorously by Senator Underwood, Democratic leader, on the ground that its adoption would mean the United States had abandoned its Allies in the war and had refused to aid them in forcing Germany to pay the reparations due.

A statement by Senator Lodge was interpreted as meaning that the Versailles Treaty could not be amended to meet the requirements of the United States and that a new treaty with Germany was necessary. President Harding's views regarding this were in doubt and there was much uncertainty regarding America's next move.

Allies Reject German Offer

GERMANY was quick to take advantage of America's promise to consider the transmission to the Allied governments of new reparations proposals, but the offer which she submitted was no more acceptable to the Powers than those previously made. As this is written, the German offer has been in the hands of the American government for several days, and the Allied capitals have been made fully acquainted with its provisions, but there has been no decision whether it shall formally be sent to the Allied governments, although the unfavorable reception accorded abroad to the terms render it improbable that Washington will consent to present it.

There was considerable ambiguity in the German note, and pending a clarification of meaning it was impossible to tell how nearly Berlin had approached to conceding the Allied demands. Germany declared her willingness to undertake for the purpose of reparations a total engagement of 50,000,000,000 gold marks present value—$12,500,000,000—and "to pay the value of this sum in annuities suited to her capacity of production up to an ultimate total of 200,000,000,000 gold marks." This was figured by French experts at 50 per cent. of the total of the Paris agreement, which called for the payment of 226,000,000,000 marks in annuities, plus 12 per cent. of the value of German exports. Berlin also proposed the immediate issuance of an international loan, the proceeds to be put at the disposal of the Allies, and suggested that Germany take over the Allies' debts to the United States to the limit of her capacity. As a proof of good-will, the German note offered to put at the disposal of the Reparations Commission the sum of 1,000,000,000 gold marks, all to be paid within three months, quite ignoring the fact that the Reparations Commission's demand of several weeks ago for the payment of 1,000,000,000 gold marks at once and of 11,000,000,000 marks by May 1 had been defied.

The French Government notified its ambassador in Washington that the German offer was absolutely unacceptable and constituted a backward step instead of making any advance toward a satisfactory settlement.

Premier Lloyd George considered the German offer "thoroughly unsatisfactory" and completely inadequate, and the British press attacked it vigorously, as likely to involve the Allies in interminable debate. Belgian officials regarded the offer as unacceptable. The hostility toward the German offer was increased by the fact that it was all conditional—"if the régime of penalties ends immediately; if the actual basis of German production is not further restricted; and if Germany is admitted to world trade and relieved from unproductive expenses."

The Reparations Commission has notified Germany that it owes a total of 132,000,000,000 gold marks, a sum smaller than was expected but far in excess of any demand that has been made by the Allies for payment. In the expectation that the negotiations would fail, the French were going ahead with preparation for the occupation of the entire Ruhr district and the Allied Supreme Council prepared an ultimatum to Berlin.

Georgia Governor Fights Peonage

GOVERNOR HUGH M. DORSEY of Georgia has issued a call to the people of that state to purge themselves of crimes against the negro race, and has outlined measures to end oppression and to bring more wholesome relations between the races. The Governor's program was contained in a booklet giving evidence of 135 instances of "negroes lynched, negroes held in peonage, negroes driven out by organized lawlessness and negroes subjected to individual acts of cruelties" within the last two years, and followed court disclosures of numerous murders of negroes in an effort to hide peonage conditions which had scandalized the nation.

Declaring that "if conditions indicated by these charges should continue, both God and man would justly condemn Georgia more severely than God and man have condemned Belgium and Leopold for the Congo atrocities," the Governor suggested a remedial program which should include: Publicity, the careful gathering of the facts regarding the treatment of negroes in the state; an organized campaign by the churches to place in every section of the state a sufficient number of Sunday schools and churches for both races to teach the principles of justice, mercy and mutual forbearance for all; compulsory education for both races; and the organization of state committees on race relations.

The repeal of laws under which peonage was made possible and the enactment of legislation to stamp out the peonage evil also were recommended. Among the suggested laws were one establishing a state constabulary which the governor could send into any county to quell disorder or to protect citizens; another to impose a financial penalty upon any county in which a lynching occurs; and measures authorizing the governor to remove officials derelict in duty and to direct legal proceedings in cases of mob violence.

The people of the country will be glad to see Georgia take the lead in remedying the evil conditions which have been revealed there and see much ground for hope of better race relations in the Governor's program.

Mr. Harding and several senators accompanied him aboard the Mayflower, while Secretary of the Navy Denby carried a party of representatives aboard the government yacht Sylph.

NINE HUNDRED GERMANS TO BE TRIED FOR WAR CRIMES. The trials of 900 German whose punishment has been demanded by the Allies for crimes committed during the war are to begin at Leipzig, Germany, on May 23. Seven judges will sit as a court.

QUEBEC WOMEN FIGHT IMMODEST DRESS. The Christian Women's League has been organized in the Canadian province of Quebec to fight immodesty in women's dress, and more than 10,000 members already have enrolled. Low-cut waists and garments too short or too thin are to be barred.

BRITISH MINE PARLEYS DEADLOCKED. Parleys between the striking British miners and the mine owners have failed to bring a settlement appreciably nearer, and negotiations again have ceased for a time. The latest government offer was of $50,000,000 to keep up the miners' wages for four months, but was rejected by the union leaders.

SHIPPING STRIKE BEGUN. A strike which threatened to tie up much of the country's ocean shipping was started in New York as the result of effort by ship-owners to reduce wages. The initial break rendered 6,000 marine engineers idle, and it was expected 40,000 or 50,000 men would be affected.

The Parable of the Sunset

A Sermon by REV. PETER AINSLIE, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT—Psa. 19:4. "He hath set a tabernacle for the sun."

GOD paints the sky at sunset and all the great artists of the world have taken up their brushes to reproduce on canvas what God has put on clouds. But the genius of painters pales before the sunset as a tallow candle beside the sun. All reproductions on canvas are bleared imitations. The sunset is immortalized only in the souls of those who see.

One summer afternoon in the Alps, the rugged pyramids of snow were touched with tints of crimson, as crimson as the clouds that hung about the setting sun. The shadow of the valley deepened over Lake Thun and the darkness like some conscious monster crept slowly up the sides of the great mountains. Each pyramid of snow held aloft its crimson tints like piles of burning coals far into the sky until the darkness threw its robes of sackcloth over mountain-tops and the lofty heights were left in the cold paleness of death, the western sky with its red, orange, yellow, green and blue dissolving into darkness, while the counter-glow of purple rested upon the eastern shadow, only to give way to the darkness of night.

It was sublimely beautiful, but as commonplace as the blooming of flowers and the shining of stars. It was only the repetition of that which had marked the close of a million days and upon which had looked ten millions of eyes. I had seen nothing that was exclusively mine, only my experience, as I stood alone in the shadow, made me feel that I was a part of what I had seen. Then I thought of Him who long ago gave the parable of the sower and its interpretation. He must still be speaking in parables. I asked myself, is He leaving us to find for ourselves the interpretation of the Parable of the Sunset?

Eternities of romance throb in the pulse-beats of the dying day. Whether it is the sunset in the mountains of rugged rocks capped with snow, or on the plains of growing corn and orchards of rich, ripe fruit; whether on the ocean or on the desert; whether in the forest of pines and oaks, or beyond the crowded buildings of a great city, the sunset so abounds in the mysteries of spiritual symbols that the eyes of sinner and saint alike turn toward it. All classes meet at the sunset, charmed by the ministry of its spiritual symbolisms, while a strange hunger fills the souls of all who look. If He summoned the lilies of the field and the birds of the air to witness to us, has He not likewise summoned the skies, with their gorgeous decoration, to witness?

IT WAS sunset and the sun had gone down in a cloud with pale crimson tints to the far north and to the far south. Over that sunset might have been written, "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath," for it was the parable of the sunset in a wrathful sky. Love and anger are indispensable parts of our emotional nature. They both must be controlled, else we pass down those illicit roads which lead to abnormal entanglements and deadly consequences.

Anger may be defensive or offensive. That is to say it may arise only when attacked, or it may arise in the desire to attack some one. The occasion is always to ward off some threatened or inflicted injury.

Wrath, as commonly used, refers to the revengeful element in anger, which may express itself in action against another, or in words reflecting on another, or in an unexpressed wish for evil to another. It is anger on the offensive and is positively sinful. Revenge is not in the moral rights of mankind. Forgiveness is essential to right living. The threatened or inflicted injury must be forgiven. The sun must not go down upon the wrathful spirit, else the whole moral vision is bleared and, if habitually practiced, one's spiritual growth becomes permanently stunted.

In the press of a thousand things upon us we forget life, if that life is not steadily growing within us. No one has a right to pollute the sunset with his wrath, or with his grumbling, or with his dissatisfied countenance, or with his censorious attitude. If the day has not gone as we wanted it to go; if we have had many disappointments, or if we have had none; or if we have had the headache or the earache, we must remember that the sunset is the time of quiet—such quiet that peace will possess our souls. The disagreeable things of the day are to be abandoned, even if it is only the weather, lest the disagreeables find permanent form in our speech; and more, the habit of complaining and retaliating leaves its mark on the under-lip, in the frowns of the forehead and in the dullness of the eyes.

*Pastor Disciples, and Editor of "Christian Union Quarterly."

These are the outward expressions of the disfigured soul within.

It does not lessen the pain when pricked by a thorn, nor does it remove the jutting rock over which we stumbled, to say "I don't see why such things were ever made." The real beauty of life lies not so much in knowing what to say, as in knowing what not to say and sticking by it. In the midst of provocation, silence is always majestic, especially if we can not command a soft answer, which is the force that turns away wrath. To avoid any reference to things that irritate, to think of the best in others, to find that every day is a saint in disguise, waiting to be discovered by us, to look around at the divine display of eternal beauties and to know that God is here, is enough for the noblest of mankind and possible to the humblest of us all. Such a day will find a sunset in the soul which no cloud with pale crimson border can ever cover.

IT WAS sunset again and through a gloom of clouds the sun burst with radiant splendor, turning all the gloom into gold. It was the advent of cheerfulness in the midst of gloom, which means daylight in the soul, whether it be night time or day, filling it with perpetual serenity. It is the attitude of the mind, which may be friendly to the sunny side of existence, on the sunny side of the hill and are themselves in the sunshine. The trinity of a cheerful temperament is faith, hope and love.

Over the gloomy clouds melting into gold may be written "Rejoice in the Lord!" Wit, humor and laughter belong to all, but joy is a distinct spiritual grace. It is the ringing of the bells upon the garments of the High Priest as He ministers at the sanctuary in the Holy of Holies. It is the ray of light flashing from between the cherubim through the curtains of the temple upon those who worship. It is the outward credential of the Spirit's inward abiding. Religion is both a joy-breeder and a joy-dispenser. It tightens all the chords of the heart-harp that have slackened by gloom and desponding, giving out enough power in the vibration of one chord to annihilate the force of temptation, and prove the goodness of God.

IT WAS another sunset, and the sun was a round disk of fire hanging like a golden coin on the misty rim of the lowering sky. It is the atmosphere of attitude and the sunset leads us into the inquiry of the principles of judgment of others. Jesus said, "Judge not." This brief sentence might be written over the sunset in letters of liquid fire, for it has been violated perhaps more than any other principle set up by Jesus, and its violation underlies many of the most common sins of mankind. Jesus must have meant just what He said—"Judge not."

His method was to present His strong, gentle, humble life in association with others, receiving sinners and eating with them. In no instance do we find Him condemning the sinner—not so much as a word, but the high standard of His life coming right up by the low standard of their lives, and that high standard clothed in humility, kindness and love, appealed to the best in all. The explanation lies in this sentence: "This is the judgment, that light is come into the world"—world-wide, gentle, penetrating light. That was His method—costly, but fruitful. To denounce the sinner is easy and generally fruitless. To be a disciple of Jesus, the way is clear to us. It is not to render moral judgment against others, but instead to practice severe self-condemnation and stand ready always to help others by genuine sympathy and cordial comradeship. Consequently in the teaching of Jesus we face the challenge of revising our ideas of moral judgment and abandoning those practices that lead to tale-bearing and such like, which hinder the fulfillment of the Christian ideals.

We are not deprived of judgment in matters of suitability of persons or circumstances in which persons are involved, or matters of habits and deeds. These are necessities and cover a wide field, including judgment of mind, character and attitude. Indeed, moral choice and quick decision in moral issues help toward high moral standards; but moral condemnation of others is as much out of the right of mankind as stealing another's property. Jesus emphatically forbade it.

Our approaches, then, to correct the wrongs of the world must have to do first of all with raising the moral standards of the world—not so much by directly condemning the wrongdoer, but condemning the low standard in which he is entangled by raising in ourselves a high moral standard clothed with humility and love. If we pursue the adverse method of attacking the wrongdoer, rather than the standard, we are dealing with the effect instead of the cause. The wrongdoer must see that the standard is wrong before he discovers the wrong in himself. If one holds to the adverse method, which is fundamentally an error, he becomes involved necessarily in two consequences, which are hurtful to character. The effect on the one judged is generally to make him resentful, or despondent, or permanently hostile, thereby defeating his possible penitence and reformation; while the effect on the one who judges is usually to elevate his spiritual pride, making him censorious and hypocritical. Jesus gave us a new method of dealing with this everyday occurrence, and every time we see the sun hanging like a golden coin in the misty atmosphere of sunset, we are reminded that Jesus is still saying, "Judge not!"

OUT of every sunset one may be able to spell some one of those great words that stand for conflicting principles in human life. As in one sunset we see the protest against anger, and in another the summons to cheerfulness, and in still another a warning against the moral judgment, so when we look upon a cloudless sunset, we see the curtain of the invisible mysteries of God's love, friendliness and immortality. The soul touches the curtain in its yearning for the

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Hiding in Thee," or "Sweet Hour of Prayer."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Trust in God's goodness: Psalm 16.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 361, first column.)

Sermon—"THE PARABLE OF THE SUNSET"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Rock of Ages," or "Work for the Night Is Coming."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud: Eternal and Wise, Powerful and Good, Almighty and Loving, search us, as we depart, to see if after this communion with Thee and fellowship with one another, we retain any hardness of heart or bitterness of spirit toward any to whom we should show mercy. And add, we beseech Thee, Thy blessing to our service that it may be complete in Christ in whose name we came together. AMEN.

or more friendly to the gloomy side. Both sides are here and it is possible for the mind to establish its own habitual mode. The more one spends of cheerfulness, the more cheerfulness he accumulates within himself, and the more gloom one gives out, the more gloom he has within. Some are spendthrifts in gloom, with hardly a day without casting a shadow, so stingy with their cheerfulness that they become misers in mirth—afraid to give for fear another will have, whereas they are ignorant of the fact that the rebound of another's cheerfulness adds to their own.

Religion has too largely lost its hold upon the imaginative and social elements of life, which are as divinely implanted within us as faith and love. These were brought into the Hebrew festivals, and cheerfulness was inculcated as a duty. It is folly to regard humor, wit and imagination as out of the pale of religion, when God gave them to us for holy use. The sense of humor is the oil in the machinery of life, where otherwise would be creaks and groans.

Cheerfulness does not come by seeking it. Perhaps that is the best way not to find it. The influence of honor, riches or pleasure is momentary. No exterior influence will give cheerfulness. It is not what one possesses, nor what one has learned, but what one is that determines the degree of cheerfulness. Each must set out to be noble, to be pure, to be honest, to be true, to be kind, and cheerfulness will follow as surely as fruit follows the blossom. The chords of cheerfulness are within us or they are nowhere. A child's hand laid upon these chords, if they are properly tuned, will bring out music. To the slightest influence the vibration will start. These are those who are most cheerful amid gloom, and who are the most appreciative of small kindnesses. They choose to live

Increase and Decrease

SUNDAY. John 3:20. "He must increase and I must decrease." And yet that very decrease is the secret of sure growth. This sort of decrease is really a making of room for Christ. Our self-importance shrinks, and we grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord. It is when we are full of self, self-opinionated, self-centred, self-seeking, that Christ is crowded out.

That was the deadliness of much of the Pharisaism in the time of our Lord. The life of the Pharisee was stock full of self. Self ran over. It was like a warehouse which is so crowded that part of the stuff is piled outside around the door. You could not go near a Pharisee without running against his egotism. You were always touching his pride. It bulged out in everything, even in his prayers. "I thank Thee that I am not as other men; I fast twice in the week, I give tithes." There is no room there for the Saviour. The house is too full. It is crammed with swelling self-conceit.

That was the deadly element in the life of the Pharisee. He would not decrease. He would not become poor in spirit. And so, perhaps, in a very wise sense we may say that increase in the Christian life consists in making room for Christ. And if we knew it, it is in this one thing that we have the secret of everything. For even in the Christian life we are apt to cumber ourselves with many things. We may have too many rules. We have rules for this, and rules for that, and rules for the other. And it is like having a multitude of rules for playing golf. "Fifteen rules for the approach shot!" "Twenty rules to observe on the green!" And what a muddle we should make of it! And I am little or no better when I try to follow some books of devotion. Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living" puts me into bonds. "Twenty rules to observe in prayer!" "Twenty rules for the cultivation of charity!" And so on, and so on. I am over-harnessed. Nay, the harness burdens me more than my appointed load. So I return very eagerly to Him who said, "Come unto Me, for My yoke is easy and My burden is light."

Well, this is the one great secret in the Christian life—making room for Christ. The royal way is just to decrease in everything and to let His increase be our strength and glory. Suppose we concentrated on that, and put all other rules on one side. Let the concentration be detailed and particular. I mean break up life's days and take each circumstance as it comes, whether it be grave or gay, large or small. Let us meet each circumstance in this attitude, and with this spirit—"In this particular circumstance I must make room for Christ. He must increase, and I must decrease. It must be filled with His presence, and the happening must now and hereafter be fragrant with His grace." Surely this would make the long range of daily events one radiant line of consecration.

That seems to have been the way of the apostle Paul. Here is his secret—"For to me to live is Christ." What is that but making room for Christ in everything? And here he states the secret again—"I live, yet not I, Christ liveth in me." Self decreases almost to the point of extinction—"Not I"—the apostle becomes complete in Christ. And so our hymn gives us the appointed attitude and aspiration—

"O Jesus Christ, grow Thou in me
And all things else recede."

Facing the Facts

MONDAY. John 9:41. "Jesus said unto them. If ye were blind, ye would have no sin; but now ye say, We see: therefore, your sin remaineth." Jesus had the supreme ability to face all the facts of life and to face them squarely. "Talk to me about anything you please," said a brilliant artist to a minister he had sent for in a time of trouble. "Talk about anything except sin; I won't think of that." Perhaps the minister did not mean to speak about sin, but he was no true minister of Christ if he shut his eyes to it. Sin is a fact, a stubborn, ugly, defiant fact. The philanthropy and sociology of the world—indeed the biology and eugenics of the world—owe a great debt to Christ for facing the fact of sin and facing it honestly. He faced it in the large and He faced it in the individual life. He spoke very plainly to the Samaritan woman of the sin of her life, and to the rich young ruler of the sin of his life. He was not censorious, not harshly critical; indeed He was very tender, very surgeon-like. A surgeon will tell a patient, "You have neuritis, or nephritis"—or whatever it may be. He faces the facts of life squarely.

How honest was Christ in His dealings with men! And that begat honesty in them. That is one of the charms of the New Testament. Men tell the truth about themselves. They face the universe with no delusions.

Much of the literature of our day is insincere. A critic says of a recent book of poems: "One can not help wondering in what kind of a universe the poet lives. The problems of the modern man seem never to have occurred to him." It is quite possible for one to shut himself up in an atmosphere of mere fancy and never come out of it. Christ brings us face to face with the problem of the conflict between the soul and the senses, the problem of the paramountcy of character over chattels, of the perpetual dissatisfaction of the soul—the inability of the world to feed the soul's hunger. It is a great thing to be able to marshal the facts of life, to enumerate and appraise them at their true value. Christ alone is competent to help us do that.

C. C. A.

Love and Service

TUESDAY. Phil. 4:13. "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Jesus Christ in us, the hope of glory, the Son of God expressing Himself in the sons of men, the Man of Calvary making himself felt through the man on the street.

"The best evidence for Christianity is a Christian," said Henry Drummond. When the woman touched the hem of the garment of the Master, she was healed because Jesus was in that garment. When the world touches us in its daily contact, it will be thrilled with health if the Great Physician be incarnated in us. If we have emptied ourselves and made room for Jesus Christ, He will so direct and move our lives that we shall be able to do all things that are constructive, helpful and inspiring.

Victor Hugo once made a speech at a banquet he gave to eighty children from the families of fishermen in a little Normandy village. This was the sum and substance of what he said: "Believe in God; love one another; fear nothing in the performance of your duty." Not very much can be added to these words. All the good words that were ever said only ring the changes on those few and wise suggestions. If a long creed helps you to do God's will, well and good, hold to your creed. If an elaborate ritual or ornate ceremony helps you there is no reason why you should not use it. But if you ever find these things coming between you and Jesus Christ, so that you cannot come into living fellowship with Him, then get them out of the way and get back to the simplicity that is in Christ. Love God and try to serve Him, accept Jesus Christ as your Saviour, love your neighbor and try to help him. Be sorry that you have done wrong and try to do better and be better, and in it all seek the help of God for Jesus' sake and you have all that is essential in the Christian religion, which is love and service for God and fellowman, through Jesus Christ, your strength.

The Soul's Call to Repentance

WEDNESDAY. Psa. 116:7. "Return unto thy rest, O my Soul." Not long ago a man entered a Bowery lodging-house in a spirit of desperation. He had been living at the pace that kills and had reached the end of his tether. His sunken cheeks and watery eyes told the story of a wasted life.

The clerk behind the counter handed him a letter, which he received with shaking hands. The handwriting was that of his father, whom he had not seen for many years—not since the hand that wrote that superscription had driven him from home and closed the door behind him. Across the envelope was written the word "Immediate." He opened and read, "My son, come back! Let us bury the past; the door is open for you."

It is such a message as this that comes to every one who has wasted the opportunities of a lifetime. It is never too late to mend. A Voice from the Cross calls, "Come back, and the past shall be buried! As for your sins, I will remember them no more against you."

Obeys the Divine Call

THURSDAY. Acts 26:19. "Whereupon I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision." Visions call loudly for translation into deeds; they are to be employed and not simply enjoyed. When the heavens opened to Paul, he rightly asked without delay, "What shall I do?" and received for answer a plan of action, which he loyally followed. Peter on the house-top had a strange vision which he was at a loss to understand until he knew certain men stood at his gate, calling him to service.

Every vision is dark with mystery until it speaks of something to be done, and we ought not to let go of such experiences without asking what is required of us.

What does it profit to have seen wonderful things if we cannot discern the next steps to their realization? Let us cling to our hours of illumination until they disclose ways and means of expression. Too frequently our disobedience consists of neglect and disuse. We are too ready to tarry in the presence of heavenly visitants, building tents for prolonged enjoyment of their radiant glories, instead of taking up the duties for which they have already prepared us. I am disobedient to my heavenly vision unless I become an effective servant of its ideal.

W. L. G.

The Love That Fills the Heart

FRIDAY. John 20:16. "Jesus saith unto her, 'Mary.' She saith unto Him, 'Rabboni.'" Why was not the word "Master" put in the place of the word "Rabboni?" Because the full tenderness and love in that familiar word could not be expressed by any other. "My Master" falls far below the endearing word so often used in the life of Mary with Jesus. The word "Mary" uttered in the familiar tone of the Saviour's voice filled her soul with joy. To her every thing beautiful and worshipful was wrapped up in the precious name "Rabboni."

Rev. Dr. William Dale, while writing an Easter sermon, had just penned the sentence "Christ is alive," when wave after wave of conscious realization of the divine Presence swept over his spirit. He walked his study exultingly repeating, "Christ is alive!" Then he wrote a book on the living Christ, translating his experience into words for the world. Such joy no doubt filled Mary's soul on that morning; language was insufficient to express her joy. "Rabboni" meant "My Lord and my God!"

Christ in the garden used the words "Abba, Father"; that word conveyed His deepest love and longing when He was crying out, "Thy will be done." "Blessed Jesus" are the words most precious to us. In all languages hearts melt with love at the name above every name, "Jesus, blessed Jesus."

Best Things First

SATURDAY. 1 Cor. 9:26. "I so run as not uncertainly." The figure is of one running a race, concentrating his energies in the direct course and letting nothing delay him. In our lives each day there are a few chief things that should be done. There are many things that can be done. If one attends to the things as they intrude themselves, without choosing and rejecting, the best are liable to be crowded out. They do not get into one's life. The running has been uncertain and there is delay. The rule should be "Best things first." Then, though a multitude of things are undone, yet, so far as attainment and results are concerned, they are done. If the mountains can be climbed by the direct ascending path, why continually go by slowly ascending spirals? And they may not be spirals, but a circular path, never ascending.

It is the second-rate things, the non-essentials, the things aside, that waste our time and prevent our rise. Uncertain and crooked running should be changed into a direct course and a steep ascent. The important, the best should come first. The rest, with gain, would be undone.

The Parable of the Sunset

eternal realities, as the woman of old touched the garment of Jesus. Disillusioned of a religion which puts its primary emphasis on external authority, and of a civilization that lingers in palsied state among barren intellectualism, the soul is in quest of an experience that has to do with spiritual realities. It is not satisfied until it beholds the invisible. Every sunset is a challenge—its beauty, its holiness, its silence. These are the mysteries of the day for the correction of the irritations and the wrongs that crowd human life.

There are things to be done. The life of God has got to be brought into this world. The best is all around us—just a plain man or woman or child, unconsciously waiting to be brought into the wholeness of life. There are possibilities in every soul for growth toward God, and every place of victory is an altar and all who help are priests. The highway to victory is by sacrifice. We suffer and conquer by suffering.

To the whole world Jesus is still saying, "If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me." It is the message of every sunset and he lives wisely who finds in his own soul the interpretation of the parable of the sunset.

Do You Borrow the Christian Herald?

THIS question is addressed to those members of the Christian Herald family, who are not subscribers, but to whom subscribers gladly lend their copy of the Christian Herald.

The Christian Herald is a great spiritual force.

Its strength grows as its readers increase.

The person who loans you his paper multiplies its influence by two. He gets as much pleasure out of giving as you do in receiving.

Now—why not multiply this force by four?

Send $2.00 to-day for a year's subscription. You, yourself will have a paper each week to loan to some one. Your friend also will be able to loan his copy elsewhere. Instead of two homes in your town being blessed with the spiritual influence of the paper, four will be energized and stimulated. The paper will thus have four opportunities to help the young people of those families to get started right.

We know from past experience that a great many readers of courtesy mean to be readers by right of purchase. Each year many of these subscribe. Why not do so now—and do your part in helping us to publish the Christian Herald and extend its influence for good.

Breaking Faith

"You're joking," she told me, "joking! Of course I've never told any untruths to my children!"

I laughed with her. But a moment later I spoke again, in a carefully casual tone.

"Didn't I hear you promise, a week ago, to take the kiddies on a tramp?" I questioned. "If I remember rightly you spoke of gathering wildflowers, and having luncheon in the woods, and perhaps—if you found a little shallow brook—of going wading. . . . Did you ever take them on that tramp?"

The mother had the grace to flush.

"Why, no," she admitted, "I didn't. You see, ever so many unexpected things happened to prevent it. One can never be sure of one's time any more! I belong to several clubs, and they do take up a number of my afternoons. And I've been doing quite a bit of sewing, and I'm way behind in my reading. And—" her voice dwindled away.

"And," I finished for her, "you just didn't have time to remember that you had made a promise! But you expect your children—who aren't so well developed as you are, mentally—to remember when they make promises. Why do you think that they should be more scrupulous about telling the truth than you are? You're their mother!"

For a moment my friend was silent. And then she answered me.

"You've made me feel rather uncomfortable," she said slowly, "telling me all this. But you've made me see something of a light, too. After all, I suppose that—if a promise isn't worth keeping—it isn't worth making!"

I'VE been blaming mothers—quite a lot. But mothers aren't the only ones who disregard promises to children. Fathers are just as careless, often, and so are big sisters and grown-up brothers. I've heard teachers make misleading statements, and I've heard many a doctor say: "This is nice medicine; it isn't at all bitter! You'll like it—why it's exactly like candy!" I've also heard dentists remark, smilingly:

"It won't hurt you at all when I pull this tooth—not at all! There are some little girls and boys who come to me and beg me to pull their teeth out!"

I know one lady over seventy who suffered for years with an abscessed jawbone because a dentist once told her—when she was seven—that his work was perfectly painless!

Some people may think that a promise to a child—a promise that's never kept—isn't a serious breach of faith. They may think that a child—because he's small and young and sometimes difficult to reason with—is beyond certain ethical barriers. Men whose word in business is as good as a certified check are quite likely to be less honest when that same word is given to their small sons! And yet those same small sons will be the business men of the next generation. And their word—when the time comes—may not be as impregnable as their father's word used to be. And, if you go back to first causes, it won't be entirely their fault!

Think carefully before you give a promise to a child! Don't just go ahead rashly and say that you'll do things you have no intention of doing. Don't, if you're a mother or a father, spoil the beautiful ideals of fatherhood and motherhood that is the heritage of all childhood. Don't, if you're a teacher, make the child-mind too incredulous to grasp the important facts that you'll some day have to teach. When you make a suggestion or a promise, keep the faith.

You grown-up people, you wouldn't knowingly give a bad check, would you? And you wouldn't, knowingly, throw away something that belonged to another person? No—of course you wouldn't! And yet, every time you break a promise to a child, you do all of these things.

A broken promise—and to a child a broken promise is the same as a plain unadulterated lie—may live for many years in the mind and heart of an individual. It may be that broken promises—and the broken faiths that they stand for—will some day wreck lives and even communities.

What a Christian Home Should Be

International Sunday-School Lesson for May 22

Luke 10:38-42; 2:51, 52; II Tim. 3:14, 15

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D. D.

THROUGH these three Scripture selections we are permitted to enter three homes. A careful study should be made of each. The daily Bible readings give other pictures of home life. Read all the Bible references found in connection with the word "home" in Nelson's Cross Reference Bible, in the concordance or Bible dictionary. Become experts in knowing the content of the Word of God.

The home is a divine institution. It was founded by God. It was cradled in the Garden of Eden and reaches its perfection in the homeland of the soul-heaven. It takes at least three to make the trinity of the home—father, mother and child or children. No home can reach its perfection without Jesus Christ constantly present. When on earth He did not have place to lay His head, but now He is the welcomed member in countless millions of homes.

Establishing a home is a serious undertaking as well as an intense joy. The initial members should both be Christians. The Bible is very clear about not being unequally yoked together with unbelievers. It is often a serious mistake to marry another with the idea of their being converted later. It is pathetic when both man and wife do not, from the very beginning, go together to the House of God. It is also sad to think of these two living together in the earthly life and separated in eternity, because one will not accept the free gift of salvation through Jesus, the Son of God.

From the first day of marriage the family altar should be erected and never thrown down. It is possible to do this, and untold blessings will result. Any one can read a selected portion of Scripture, and if neither can offer audible voluntary prayer, they can at least pray together the prayer of our Lord. The spiritual life of any church would be increased manifold if all the homes maintained daily family worship. Take a vote in any group of active church workers and you will find that not more than 25 per cent. have the family altar in their homes. If the entire church should be polled, the percentage would be much lower. On the foreign mission field the percentage is much higher—at least 50 per cent. of the homes of native Christians in China have daily family prayers.

A PROUD son, who was about to be married, led his father from room to room of the newly furnished home, showing the different articles of furniture and adornment. The son waited in vain to hear a favorable comment from the father and at last he asked "How do you like this home?" The father turning to the young man raised the question about what in the home designated it a Christian home—no Bible was seen, Christian books were not in evidence, and no religious pictures adorned any of the walls. This had not been the intention, and the lack was gladly and quickly remedied. Our homes should be so furnished that even a casual caller would know that Christ had an acknowledged place in that home. Homes of native Christians on the foreign field betoken this fact. The large Bible lesson picture rolls, which are used in our Sunday schools in the home land, are prized as oil paintings would be. The study of this lesson may cause some to survey their own homes with reference to the place of Christian art in them.

The blessing will be asked in every home where Christ is rightly known. This also should be the habit from the very first meal in the new home. God is the giver of the bounty that is about to be enjoyed and at least the following can be said, as heads are bowed—"For what are we about to receive may the Lord make us truly thankful." When Jesus became a guest in that home in Emmaus it was as He blessed the bread that He became known to those with whom He had walked and talked that first Easter afternoon.

Differences were apparent in the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus. As long as homes are made up of humans there will be difficulties to be adjusted; but if Christ is a participating member of that family circle, all such problems can happily be settled. The oil of love and the presence of Christ will overcome all friction. Home quarrels and the family altar are widely separated. It is often said that it is harder to be a Christian at home than anywhere else. Even so, one can be a Christian anywhere, and there is something lacking in the home when each does not actually help the others to be at their very best in living Christ's life. If it is harder to be a Christian at home then the victory is greater when you succeed.

Jesus in the home is most beautifully pictured in that familiar passage in Luke. Obedience, helpfulness and four-fold growth become examples to every child. He who could later command angels and they would obey and minister to Him was subject to Mary and Joseph.

The home of Timothy suggests much concerning the influence of Christian heredity or heritage. Mother and grandmother were lovers of their Lord and the lad was in a good atmosphere from the earliest years. A tremendous burden is placed upon the Sunday school when the home does not exert a Christian influence. Well-grounded faith and deep religious convictions should be the product of the Christian home. Then the children can meet, possibly without any harm, the loose thinking and low ideals that are so prevalent in the world today.

Jealousy can have no place in the home where the teachings of Christ are lived. There each esteems the other better than himself, and no true parent will place Esau above Jacob.

IN THESE modern days the home is in danger. Congested housing conditions tend to destroy what is idealized as the home. Hotel life robs the children at least of their rightful heritage in this respect. "Going out to meals" is an increasing habit, especially among those who live in apartments. This is not a home-making custom. Not to indicate anything else, asking the blessing before eating is usually omitted, and this is a serious neglect. So-called home becomes little more than a sleeping-place. Home, as of old, should be the center of interest, a bulwark against going astray, and the place for which self-denial is a joy.

Among the related passages which should be carefully studied is Eph. 5:22-6:9. There is something very important for every member of the trinity of the home. Give special attention also to the Golden Text: Col. 3:21-22. The obligation resting upon children to "obey their parents" is usually emphasized to the exclusion of "fathers, provoke not your children." The home is the place where each member has rights as well as duties which need to be faithfully observed.

"Lord, make me so that it will be easier for others to live with me," is a prayer that goes well with the word coined by Frances E. Willard, namely Live-with-able-ness. If we are Christians His life must find expression in ours.

It is a delight to meditate about "Home, Sweet Home"; around the hearth fire; the family altar, etc., and it is also a joy to think forward to the eternal heavenly home where there can be no separations, tears, weaknesses, and where the inhabitant shall not say, "I am sick." If Christ live with us here, we will be with him forever. He said, "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also."

What Makes Antiques Retain Their Charm?

The work of the old masters, whether in the painting art or in household woodcraft, owed much of its beauty to the careful selection of varnish; and it comes down to us with its beauty largely undimmed because of the time-defying qualities of the same product.

The careful selection of varnish is an equally vital factor in the permanent charm of the modern home. And for sixty-three years Berry Brothers have based their whole manufacturing policy on this essential of quality.

There is a Berry Brothers product for every varnish need. They are sold by good dealers everywhere. And you cannot go wrong if you make the Berry Brothers label your guide.

Young People's Topics for May 22

In School with Christ and His Disciples

E. L. Institute Sunday, Mark 6:31

THE institute is a training-camp for Christian soldiers. It is not a question as to whether Jesus Christ might need us that we should be ready for service, but that Jesus Christ needs us now to render the service necessary. It is not if He should need us but because He does need us. We owe it to our Divine Leader and to our age to become efficient mentally, physically and spiritually. Therefore we owe it to ourselves to equip for highest and best usefulness. Education is not the accumulation of knowledge or the possessing of ability, but the use to which we put our knowledge and ability. The institute enables us to be "workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightfully dividing the word of truth." That kind of a workman is the only kind that will be recognized or succeed in this particular and practical age. An institute is a place where we learn, are inspired, get equipment. It is kin to preparatory school and college. Fundamentally it is a place where we learn how to be better Christians—and a true Christian is always hungering for higher things. "If I cease becoming better," wrote Cromwell in his Bible, "I shall soon cease to do good." Great biographies are more than interesting reading matter. They are the lives of seeking men and women, of men and women who are not content to stand still.

My Favorite Saying of Christ, and Why

C. E., B. Y. P. U., John 6:33, 68; Matt. 7:24-25

GREAT is the power of words. Suppose we were to forget all the words we ever knew? And suppose everybody else had forgotten all the words they ever knew? The result would be a tragedy. The world would stand still. Words are the means of communication without which mental processes and even physical transaction would cease. There are beautiful words and ugly words. It would not do even to forget the ugly words, for words are symbols that represent values. We need the word "hate" in order to see the value of "love." We need the word "shame" in order to recognize the ideal "virtue." Words help us to make contrasts, weigh evidence, discern between the good and the bad. But words that become flesh, words that are made a part of the life, words that are incarnated, like the words of Jesus, are the best words. Contrast the life of Jesus with His words and note how the person of Christ and the words of Christ harmonize. His beautiful words are the symbols of His beautiful life. Let us make His beautiful words ours and we shall make our lives beautiful. Living the sayings of Jesus, we live His life. Remember the words of Livingstone concerning Jesus' promises: "They are the words of a gentleman. He will not go back on them. That's all there is to it." To Livingstone the words of Jesus were final. Are they final to us? Let us make them ours. Make this meeting profitable by each member quoting his or her favorite words of Jesus Christ. We cannot of course quote them all, but all may quote some.

Those Costly Daughters

THE girls of Baroda are a great expense to their fathers, but quite an asset to their husbands. In case of debt a man will marry a wife just to get his father-in-law's help in paying off his debts, and this same long-suffering father-in-law must often shoulder most of the cost of his daughter even after she is married, besides furnishing her with a dowry. A Brahman father-in-law may even be called on to meet the expenses of his son-in-law's mother! Therefore when a girl baby is born, her father is keenly regretful.

Delicious "Last Minute" Desserts

WHEN the clock gets 'round to a half hour before dinner time with the dessert still unplanned --then is when you are glad you've stocked your pantry shelf with ZANOL Food Products.

had the farm leased from year to year, but Mr. Gary gie'n me a five-year contract as a consecration for ma losses. Ye'll hae to pay me ma wages for five year, in any lawful court, as he'll tell ye. And I'm thinkin' ye haena overmuch money to spend on foolishness like that!"

"Oh, if I just did have money!" thought Ruth, in dismay. Outwardly she assumed a coldly formal demeanor, trusting Donaldson would be deceived by it, and not guess the dismay she felt. "Very well, we shall see about that, Donaldson," she said, and turned her back indignantly upon the manager, who chuckled audibly as she moved away. "He knows so well," thought the indignant Ruth, "how very, very impotent I am!"

If only she could afford to pay him him his five years' wages and let him go! It was not often that Ruth felt anger, but her wrath flamed up fiercely at thought of the coolness with which her manager had stated his position and how justly he had summed up her own! She might rage, but it would do no good. Donaldson was safe in his rights.

"And doubtless he'll marry, and fetch Mary right here, to live on my own place—and poor Tom to work for him! I can not imagine anything more subtly cruel."

And then Ruth made up her mind that she would visit the Smithers family, and lay the case before them. Surely a father, even Jacob Smithers, might be persuaded, if the case were presented with tact and gentleness, to avoid sacrificing his daughter for a meager sum of money, such as Donaldson possessed.
